The Two-way Process

THE REPORT INTO METHODS of teaching in nurse training schools just published* should be in the hands of every tutor in the country, should be compulsory reading for all tutor candidates and should be thoroughly digested by all members of nurse education committees. It goes without saying that it will appear on the agendas of all ANTCs throughout the United Kingdom.

The South West Metropolitan Area Nurse Training Committee, with the concurrence of the GNC, instituted a pilot research survey into methods of teaching in 17 hospitals. The survey was carried out by two experienced and enthusiastic educationists, Miss A. Catnach and Miss M. Houghton. The ANTC has been so impressed with the points that emerge that a conference is to be held on the report.

The writers of the report appreciate to the full the two-way process that characterizes all good teaching; the arousing of interest and the exploration of each other's minds by teacher and pupil; the stimulation of inquiry and the relating of the matter in hand to larger issues. 'Nothing can be more enjoyable than the repartee of quick question and answer, of the play of mind upon mind, of the shared exploration of new knowledge.'

The two educationists were a little saddened by the deficiency in accommodation for a working library in many training schools. They tell of the tutor who, after requesting £100 for books year after year, still has only an inadequate grant of £20. They comment on the adequacy of films, filmstrips and projectors, and the thought occurs to the reader of the report that perhaps hospital authorities, having supplied the magic lanterns, feel that such toys will keep the children quiet and amused.

There is little room for complacency on ward teaching, about which the writers were told much but were able to see little. They emerge as firm supporters of clinical instructors for, ideal though it may be for the ward sister to teach, she is overburdened. The tutor, in their view, already has a full time-table and moreover is the only person trained and equipped for classroom teaching.

Miss Catnach and Miss Houghton would like to see the whole of nurse training regarded as a project (in the technical sense of the word). The project method relates every part of what is taught to one central theme, a theme in which the pupil has a natural interest and which she wishes to pursue for her own sake. The project of nurse training is, of course, the Care of the Patient, with 'nursing' as the central, all-important subject in the curriculum, and all related subjects subordinated to it.

This report is written by two wise educationists; women whose eyes are very properly on the stars, but whose feet are planted firmly on the ground.

RCN Join NUT Deputation to Chancellor

THE COLLEGE, together with several other organizations, will be represented on the deputation to meet the Chancellor of the Exchequer which resulted from a conference of organizations representing 683,000 employees in the public service, called by the National Union of Teachers. The conference expresses its strongest opposition to the Chancellor's 'pay pause' and to the Government interference with the independence of negotiating machinery and arbitration. In accepting the invitation to join the deputation, the College has made it quite clear that it will not be prepared to support, in any circumstances whatsoever, any action which will limit the service given by nurses to the patient. An official College statement is on page 1241.

Idealism Not Dead Yet

A YOUNG NURSE is one of four young people who have volunteered for at least a year's work in India among Tibetan refugees and Indian lepers. The party, which includes a teacher and a German girl from Hamburg, is the first to go out under special 'orientation training' organized by International Voluntary Service (British branch of Service Civil International). Entirely financed by voluntary subscriptions, the volunteers will receive only pocket money of £2 a month in addition to free board and lodging. Miss Valerie Haggar, the nurse, will work among Tibetan refugees; the others at a school for Tibetans, a leprosy health home and among slum dwellers of Madras. Who says that the ideals of service and spirit of adventure are dead among young people today?

Mouth-to-mouth breathing (See 'Expired-air Resuscitation', Nursing Times, Oct. 28, 1960)

Mannikins for Mouth-to-Mouth Breathing

MOUTH-TO-MOUTH BREATHING for emergency resuscitation is being taught to every schoolchild in Norway. NATO forces are being instructed in its use and now the British Red Cross Society and St. John Ambulance Association have decided to include it in the next edition of their joint first-aid manual. The aesthetic objections to practising this type of mouth-to-mouth or mouth-to-nose resuscitation make it essential to use mannikins for the task. The Lancet, in an annotation, suggests that British schoolchildren should be taught the method and that some benefactor might supply the necessary number of mannikins (in Norway they cost £35). Obviously, every nurse training school will need one and this will be another item for the ANTC estimates.

'Casework Principles'

'CASEWORK PRINCIPLES', a non-resident refresher course for health visitors, will be held at the Royal College of Nursing, London, from January 8 to 19, 1962. This course has been specially designed to meet the needs of health visitors working with problem families. Study groups, under the guidance of experienced caseworkers, will base their discussion on case histories supplied by members of the course. Only a limited number of places are available and application should be made at once to the director in the Education Division. The planning of this course reflects the growing importance of casework principles in the work of the health visitor. Recent articles in the Nursing Times have included 'The Aims and Methods of Social Casework' (July 29, 1960) and 'Psychological Factors in Social Casework' (June 30, 1961).

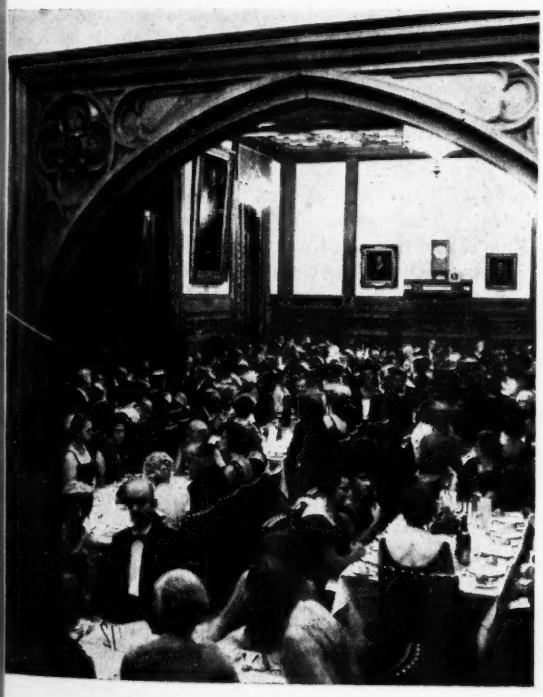
Acute Shortage of Physiotherapists

SIR CECIL WAKELEY, president of the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, gave a serious warning on the present shortage of physiotherapists: 'Patients are going without treatment', he said, 'because of this national shortage.' Many hospital physiotherapy departments were at half strength and doctors could not get for their patients the treatment required. The elderly, in particular, were suffering; there was great need, too, for more mobile physiotherapy vans equipped and staffed to visit the housebound. Sir Cecil was speaking at the annual dinner of the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, held at the House of Commons last week, at the conclusion of the Society's annual congress.

Sir Cecil Wakeley, in genial mood, and Mrs. Eveline Hill, M.P., receive the 300 guests.

It was particularly appropriate that the dinner at the House should be sponsored by Mrs. Eveline Hill, M.P., J.P., the guest of honour, who so energetically assisted in the passage through Parliament of the Bill now on the Statute Book as the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act. Mrs. Hill spoke of the need for more residential accommodation at schools of physiotherapy as a spur to recruitment. Shortage of teachers was, however, the more serious problem, and she welcomed the shortened one-year course for teachers about to be launched.

Miss M. J. Neilson, secretary-general, World Confederation of Physical Therapy (formerly general secretary to the Chartered Society), replying for the guests, reminded her colleagues of the wider responsibilities of the profession. Today many physiotherapists took posts overseas and not only must they uphold the high professional standards expected of them, but they should be prepared to uphold British principles and way of life, and to prove that democracy meant far more than merely 'the right to make the wrong decision'.



Memorable scene: the dinner held in the Members' dining-room at the House of Commons.

PAEDIATRIC

Haemolytic Disease of the Newborn

B. W. POWELL, M.B., M.R.C.P., D.C.H., Consultant Paediatrician, Peterborough Area

One pregnancy in 200 results in a baby with haemolytic disease. Many of these babies can be saved by exchange transfusion, a dramatic treatment which was recently shown to the general public in a television programme 'Your Life in Their Hands'.

EACH YEAR, in England and Wales, there are about 350 deaths among babies with haemolytic disease and perhaps 500 still-births. It has been estimated (Walker and Mollison, 1957) that more than 150 of these liveborn babies could be saved. No new knowledge is required to bring this about, only a better application of the knowledge we already have.

One marriage in eight is between a Rh-negative woman and a Rh-positive man, and one pregnancy in 200 results in a baby with haemolytic disease.

The Basic Facts

The basic facts are well-known and can be stated simply. If a Rh-negative woman carries a Rh-positive baby she may produce antibodies which can destroy the baby's Rh-positive red cells. (Exactly the same anti-Rh antibodies can be produced if she is transfused with Rh-positive blood.) The antibody can cross the placenta, and during the second half of pregnancy it may get into the baby's bloodstream and cause haemolysis.

This has two serious effects. The destruction of red cells causes anaemia and the accumulation of bile pigments causes jaundice. The condition may be so mild as to give rise to no clinical signs or it may be so severe as to cause still-birth long before term is reached. About 60 per cent. of affected liveborn babies are affected seriously enough to require treatment.

The proper management of these cases begins in the antenatal period and it is in the field of antenatal care that we can best hope for improvement. Experience shows that among those responsible for antenatal care there is sometimes a lack of appreciation of what can be done and a failure to realize that treatment of the baby is often an extremely urgent matter. A few hours' delay in starting an exchange transfusion may result in the death of a baby or the even greater tragedy of a child surviving with a grossly damaged brain. It is therefore imperative that any baby at risk should be born in a hospital where expert treatment can be given without delay. This can only be achieved if everybody concerned realizes the importance and the implications of blood tests during pregnancy.

It is now generally agreed that the best treatment is an exchange transfusion whereby the baby's Rh-positive red cells are replaced by Rh-negative cells. By the end of the transfusion nearly all the red cells in the baby's circulation will be Rh-negative. These cannot be destroyed by any antibody which remains, and when the baby starts to produce his own Rh-positive red cells there should not be enough antibody left to cause any further destruction. The transfusion also washes out some of the excess of bilirubin, but sometimes a second or even a third transfusion has to be given to prevent the bilirubin rising to a dangerous level.

When a mother has once produced Rh-antibodies each succeeding Rh-positive child she carries will stimulate her to produce more, and each child is likely to be more severely affected than the previous one. It is rare for the first child to be affected but it does sometimes happen even when there is no definite history of a blood transfusion.

Management during Pregnancy

Early diagnosis is important for the proper management of these cases and every woman should have her blood group determined during her first pregnancy. This is best done at the first antenatal visit.

Every Rh-negative woman, even in her first pregnancy, should have her blood tested for the presence of antibodies. This is best done at the first visit and again not later than 34 or 35 weeks. In certain cases, where a severely affected baby is expected, more frequent tests from the 30th week onwards may be advised.

Every mother who is found to have antibodies during pregnancy should be delivered in a hospital where good facilities for exchange transfusion are available. It is only in this way that adequate preparations for treating the baby can be made.

When a mother is found to be Rh-negative it is also important to know the husband's blood group. A sample should be examined during the first pregnancy. If he is Rh-negative all the children will be Rh-negative too and no incompatibility will occur. If he is Rh-positive he may be homozygous or heterozygous. A the children of a homozygous Rh-positive parent will be Rh-positive, but when the father is heterozygous there is an equal chance of each child being either positive or negative.

Detection of Cases and Prediction of Severity

In nearly every case the presence of antibodies during pregnancy gives sufficient evidence that the baby will be affected, and as these are almost always present by 35 weeks very few cases should be missed if the tests are done routinely.

It is not enough, however, merely to predict whether or not the baby will be affected. An attempt must be made to foretell the severity of the case. This is often a difficult problem and there is as yet no entirely satisfactory answer to it. The two most important factors to consider are the history of previous pregnancies and the titre of antibodies in the mother's blood. There is some conflict of opinion as to the reliability of antibody levels, but Tovey and Valaes (1959) and Kelsall, Vos and Kirk (1958) have shown that the indirect antiglobulin test (indirect Coombs' test) may be of value in foretelling whether still-birth is likely to occur. This is the crux of the matter from a practical point of view, for if a still-birth is not anticipated the pregnancy should be left to go to term. If on the other hand a still-birth seems likely, early induction or Caesarean section gives the best chance of saving the baby. Tovey and Valaes recommend induction if the indirect Coombs' titre is 1 in 40 or higher at 36 weeks in a first affected pregnancy, but 1 in 10 or 1 in 20 in subsequent pregnancies.

In considering the previous pregnancies, the general rule is that each affected child will be more severely affected than the previous ones. If, therefore, there has been a previous still-birth or severely affected liveborn child, early induction will be advisable.

Induction at 35-36 weeks should save a number of still-births, and at this stage of pregnancy prematurity should not greatly increase the risk for the baby. In exceptional cases, where there has been more than one still-birth already, Caesarean section as early as 32 weeks may be considered.

Management of the Baby at Birth

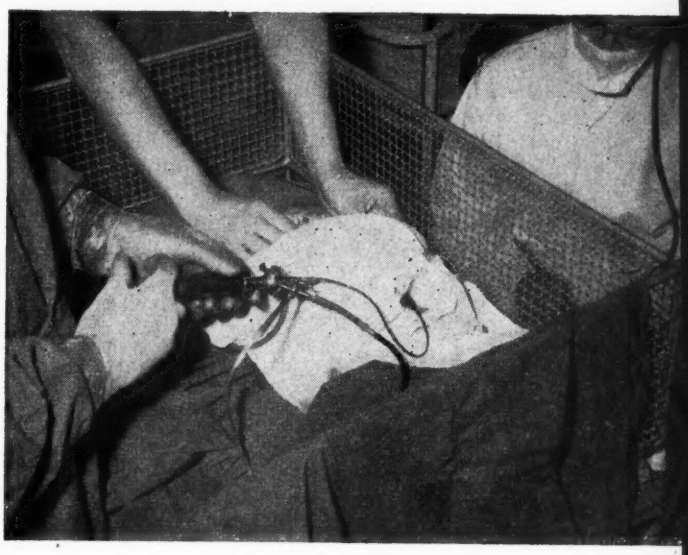
At birth the cord should be clamped immediately and some cord blood taken with a syringe from the umbilical vein. Clotted and unclotted samples should be sent to the laboratory for the following investigations.

Coombs' Test (direct antiglobulin test) to detect the presence of maternal antibodies in the baby's blood. It should be positive in all affected babies.

Haemoglobin to determine the degree of anaemia. If the haemoglobin is below 15.5 g. an exchange transfusion should be done. If it is above this level an exchange transfusion may still be advisable if the child is premature or if a previous child has been badly affected. A very strongly positive Coombs' test is also an indication for doing an exchange transfusion.

Serum bilirubin to determine the degree of jaundice. If the bilirubin level is more than 2.6 mg. an exchange transfusion should be considered even if the haemoglobin is over 15.5 g.

Rhesus grouping. This information may not help in the immediate management of the case (except, of course, that a Rh-negative baby excludes the possibility of Rh-incompatibility). It is sometimes useful in retrospect when assessing the outcome of future pregnancies.



An exchange transfusion in progress.

Clinical examination of the baby immediately after birth is important. If there are obvious clinical signs of haemolytic disease one need hardly wait for the results of laboratory tests, although these should never be omitted. Pallor, rapidly developing jaundice, oedema and signs of heart failure, such as enlargement of the liver or crepitations in the lungs, are all signs of a severely affected baby. In very severely affected cases the pallor and oedema will amount to hydrops foetalis, but this condition usually causes still-birth, and if the child is born alive survival is unlikely. Jaundice occurring at any time within the first 24 hours should be regarded as being due to haemolytic disease until proved otherwise and any child becoming jaundiced on the first day should be admitted to hospital for investigation.

Exchange Transfusion

Various techniques for carrying out exchange transfusion have been described. It is now almost always done by passing a plastic catheter into the umbilical vein and alternately withdrawing and injecting blood in units of 10 or 20 ml. Group O Rh-negative blood is used. It should be as freshly drawn from the donor as possible. The cells are packed before use by drawing off the supernatant plasma from the blood before use. Usually 60 ml. per pound body weight is exchanged.

In badly affected babies the venous pressure is often raised and for this reason up to 50 ml. of blood is withdrawn initially before starting the exchange, to do what is, in effect, a venesection.

The procedure is not free from risk and should only be done with the utmost care and by an experienced person. Even babies not severely affected should be closely watched for signs of circulatory collapse during the transfusion.

Care after Birth

During the first few days of life the baby should be closely observed. Jaundice usually increases for about four days in full-term babies and for about a week in premature babies. If the serum bilirubin level in the blood rises above 20 mg. per cent. there is a risk that the child will get kernicterus, and if this critical level is approached a second exchange transfusion, or even a third, should be done. This can usually be achieved again via the umbilical vein.

Kernicterus is a rare complication nowadays, but if it does occur signs become evident during the first two weeks. Hypertonia, neck stiffness, a cerebral cry and convulsions are signs which may occur. If they are not seen during the first two weeks it is very unlikely that the basal ganglia have been damaged. Mild signs of cerebral irritation may be present at this time in babies who later develop normally.

Some degree of anaemia often occurs and the haemoglobin reaches its lowest level, usually about 60 per cent., at approximately six weeks of age. After this time the haemoglobin level slowly rises. Extra iron is not necessary as the excessive haemolysis which has occurred has already provided the child with adequate stores of iron. Occasionally a more severe fall in the haemoglobin level occurs and this may require a small simple transfusion.

Haemolytic Disease due to other Causes

Although the large majority of cases of haemolytic disease are caused by Rhesus incompatibility, the condition may arise in other ways. The A, B, O blood groups may cause an incompatibility. The mother is in these cases, usually group O and the baby group A or B. Haemolysins may be detected in the mother's blood, but it is rare for severe clinical manifestations to occur and treatment is hardly ever necessary (Valentine 1958).

Premature babies may develop jaundice from an accumulation of bile pigments resulting from excessive haemolysis and immature liver function. The build-up of bile pigments occurs more slowly than in haemolytic disease and reaches its peak in about seven days. Exchange transfusion may be necessary to keep the serum bilirubin level below 20 mg. per cent.

MEDICINE

Peptic Ulcer

2. Medical and Surgical Treatment

GEOFFREY WATKINSON, M.D.(Lond.), M.R.C.P. (Lond.),
Consultant Physician to the York Hospitals; late Senior Lecturer in Medicine, University of Leeds, Honorary Assistant Physician to the United Leeds Hospitals

In peptic ulceration, surgery can at present offer more hope of cure and the prevention of recurrence than can medical treatment. Against this must be weighed the risks of the operation and the possibility of unpleasant sequelae.

MEDICAL TREATMENT

TREATMENT in peptic ulcer is directed towards three objectives which become increasingly difficult to achieve, namely: (i) relieving the patient's pain; (ii) healing the ulcer; (iii) preventing its recurrence. This is attempted, with limited success, by resting the patient, giving an appropriate diet and using drugs having antacid or antisecretory properties.

Rest

Physical and mental rest have been shown to be the quickest and most certain ways of easing ulcer pain and accelerating healing, and whenever possible should be enforced for three or four weeks if symptoms are severe. Free discussion of domestic and business problems should be undertaken and mild sedatives used to obtain mental relaxation.

Smoking, Alcohol and Coffee

Smoking has been demonstrated to cause relapse and delay ulcer healing and its omission should be advised. However, this restriction in a habitual smoker may occasion such frustration as to be harmful, so a reduction only is advised, cigarettes being smoked after meals. Alcohol and caffeine are used as stimulants to gastric secretion experimentally, and their use by the ulcer patient should be forbidden.

Dietary Treatment

Gastric diets have been devised on the following principles:

(1) to exert an antacid action, meals are given at two-hourly intervals and consist largely of milk which has both buffering and nutritive properties;
(2) the diet should have an adequate calorie and vitamin content, particularly of ascorbic acid;
(3) it should be free of irritant particles which might irritate the ulcer crater;
(4) it should be, but seldom is, as palatable as possible.

Initially, 5 oz. milk feeds are given between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m., extra milk being taken at night if the patient awakes. These feeds can be flavoured with Ovaltine, cocoa or Horlicks or made into egg custards, junkets or milk puddings. Later, meals of soup, steamed fish, chicken, lamb, and minced meats can be added as the patient improves. Fried foods, pastries, new bread, pork, condiments, strong coffee or tea and nuts should be avoided, together with any food the patient finds indigestible.

Antacids

Antacids are of two types: soluble, such as sodium bicarbonate which exerts a neutralizing effect by the release of carbon dioxide, and insoluble, such as magnesium trisilicate or aluminium hydroxide which absorb acid directly. With the soluble antacids there is a risk of inducing alkalosis, so the insoluble drugs are usually given and are more effective as a mixture of powder than in tablet form. Teaspoonful doses of magnesium trisilicate or aluminium hydroxide powder are usually given two-hourly midway between meals. Mist. magnesium trisilicate BPC, ½—1 fl. oz., is another popular remedy containing bicarbonate in addition to the insoluble compound.

Antisecretory Drugs

As nearly half the acid produced by the stomach results from vagal stimulation, it seemed logical to use drugs which by blocking the vagus nerve would reduce both the secretion and motility of the stomach. Atropine derivatives, such as tincture of belladonna, 15—30 minims four-hourly, were first used, but later a bewildering array of similar compounds were developed such as Banthine, Pro-Banthine, Antrenyl and Nacton, for which is claimed an increased potency of action and a lessened tendency to produce unpleasant side-effects. It has still to be shown that these much more expensive compounds are any more effective than atropine itself. In all cases the dose of the drug used should be adjusted to produce minimal dryness of the mouth; tolerance varies enormously from patient to patient.

Milk Drip

If pain persists despite bed-rest and the full medicinal régime advised above, the use of a milk drip frequently proves invaluable, rapidly relieving pain and accelerating healing. A fine rubber or plastic tube is introduced into the stomach through the nostril. The tube is attached by a giving set to a litre bottle containing citrated milk which is dripped continuously into the stomach. Six pints are administered daily, to which can be added vitamins, antacids, sugar or dried protein to increase the calorie value. The tube is removed daily for cleaning. The treatment is often gratefully accepted for one or two weeks by the ulcer patient in severe pain (Fig. 4). A more tolerable alternative to this treatment consists of letting the patient dissolve dried milk tablets (Nulacin) in the mouth two to four-hourly, which has proved to be a popular and effective remedy.

Management and Prevention of Relapse

Healing of gastric ulcers should be confirmed radiologically by X-rays at six-weekly intervals. Serial X-rays of the duodenal cap are, however, of limited value, healing being assessed on clinical grounds.

In preventing relapse the patient should attempt to avoid fatigue by reducing his commitments, to continue a strict diet for three months after becoming symptom-free and subsequently to take meals regularly, avoiding indigestible foods. Smoking and alcohol should be restricted and periodic rest days or weekends enforced.

SURGICAL TREATMENT

Despite vigorous efforts by the physician, surgical treatment is frequently required in the treatment of peptic ulcer. This becomes desirable when:

(1) the ulcer is judged intractable by producing symptoms persistently for two years or more, or when the pain cannot be relieved by medical means and is interfering materially with work or enjoyment of life;
(2) the ulcer recurs after haemorrhage, perforation or adequate medical treatment;
(3) there are complications of cicatricial deformity, perforation or uncontrollable bleeding;
(4) a gastric ulcer is thought to be potentially malignant because it is large or situated in the pyloric canal.

Several operations are performed (Fig. 5). Gastro-enterostomy, devised by Moynihan to by-pass the ulcer, yielded good results in many patients, but was followed in over one-third of those treated by the development of an ulcer in the region of the anastomosis. This operation is now seldom employed save in the elderly and the frail.

Removal of two-thirds of the stomach or partial gastrectomy is more widely used and yields better results. Continuity is restored by joining the duodenum directly to the gastric remnant, or by the Bilroth I procedure, usually adopted for gastric ulcer (Fig. 5). Alternatively, the duodenal stump is closed and a gastro-jejunostomy performed, a procedure usually adopted in duodenal ulcer (Fig. 5).

Realization that much of gastric secretion was controlled by the vagus nerve led Lester Dragstedt to advise that the vagi be divided in the treatment of duodenal ulcer. Vagotomy is usually combined with a gastro-enterostomy to avoid the retention of gastric contents and yields excellent results in most patients (Fig. 5).

Results of Surgical Treatment

While the results of these operations are excellent in the majority of patients, sequelae develop in a few. In a small proportion an anastomotic ulcer may form. Patients after gastrectomy may be troubled by failure to gain weight, vomiting bile, anaemia, diarrhoea and by tiredness, faintness and palpitations after food (termed the 'dumping syndrome'). After vagotomy, diarrhoea may be a minor disability in a few patients.

To date, therefore, surgery has been able to effect

Fig. 4. Illustrates the use of a milk drip in the treatment of peptic ulcer. A fine rubber tube attached to a giving set is introduced through the nose into the stomach. Through the tube are administered six pints of milk daily and antacids, vitamins, sugar and dried protein can be added to the drip if necessary.

more cures and prevent more recurrences than has medical treatment. Against this must be weighed the risks of the operation and the few patients in whom unpleasant sequelae develop after operation.

TREATMENT OF COMPLICATIONS

Haemorrhage

Haematemesis or melaena is best treated in hospital. The patient is put to bed and the blood pressure and pulse rate are recorded hourly. Blood should be obtained for cross-matching should transfusion be required. The patient should be reassured and a sedative given; if he is restless or shocked morphia, gr. $\frac{1}{6}$, should be injected. Attempts to establish the cause of bleeding should be made by the history and an examination. In recent years early barium meal examination and gastroscopy have been used increasingly to establish an early diagnosis.

The need for transfusion should be assessed; it is required if there is clinical evidence of massive, continued or recurrent bleeding as judged by tachycardia, hypotension or anaemia. The amount of blood required will have to be suited to the needs of each patient. A semi-solid diet should be given two-hourly, with milk feeds at night; antacids, ascorbic acid and sedatives should also be given. Constipation frequently follows the bleeding and should be dealt with by a small dose of paraffin and a glycerine suppository. Once haemorrhage has ceased the patient should be got up, there being no evidence that prolonged bed-rest improves the recovery rate.

Occasionally bleeding continues, recurs or becomes uncontrollable and in these circumstances surgery is advised and an emergency gastrectomy performed. This course is advised early in the middle-aged or elderly in whom the mortality is greatest, and in those where a chronic peptic ulcer is known or suspected to be present.

Perforation

If the ulcer perforates the patient should be urgently admitted to hospital. After resuscitation an emergency operation is performed and the perforation is sutured. In the elderly or severely shocked, medical treatment is rarely used. Here a gastric tube is passed and continuous aspiration employed, intravenous fluids are given and morphia used liberally to control pain. In these circumstances the perforation may seal off spontaneously.

Pyloric Obstruction

Pyloric obstruction, with dehydration and alkalosis, needs urgent treatment in hospital. Fluid and electrolyte depletion must be rapidly corrected by intravenous fluids, and a careful input and output chart maintained. The stomach should be emptied each night by a large oesophageal tube so that its muscular tone may be regained overnight. A few patients improve with medical treatment by diet and antispasmodic drugs but in the majority the obstruction must be relieved surgically by a short-circuiting operation such as gastrectomy or gastro-enterostomy. Hour-glass deformity tends to develop in thin elderly women, and frequently an operation is necessary to correct it.

Summary

The pathology, causation, clinical features, complications and treatment of peptic ulcer have been summarized. Despite considerable advances in recent years its aetiology remains undecided and medical treatment unsatisfactory. Surgery has been able to produce more cures and fewer recurrences than are achieved by medical means.

ADDITIONAL NURSING NOTES

by a member of the Nursing Times Nursing Advisory Panel

THE PATIENT with a history of peptic ulcer may be admitted as a list case for gastrectomy, as an emergency for repair after perforation, or as an emergency following haemorrhage for whom it may be decided that gastrectomy is necessary after resuscitation. Gastro-enterostomy is sometimes performed as a short circuit in elderly or enfeebled patients.

When the patient is admitted as an emergency the observations required are the same as in a case of haemorrhage. The pulse will be weak and rapid; any fall in blood pressure should be reported; the patient will have a grey pallor and the skin will be cold and clammy.

When the patient is admitted as a list case the following observations must be made: the patient's weight and build; the condition of his mouth; whether pain follows meals half to three hours later (gastric ulcer) or two to four hours later (duodenal ulcer).

For several days before operation the patient has adequate dental care and mouth cleansing; a nourishing non-residual diet with added vitamin C; regular bowel care with mild aperients or enemata, and sedatives at night. Smoking and alcohol should be avoided.

On the morning of operation a Ryle's tube is passed and the stomach washed out (some surgeons do not advocate this). The field of operation is shaved and prepared from nipple line to knees.

After operation the patient is returned to a cool bed and raised to a sitting position when fully conscious. Tap water or saline is administered rectally until oral fluids are established. The Ryle's tube is aspirated frequently. The patient has deep breathing exercises. Sterile water is given by mouth after the first 12 hours, and glucose and water, 1-2 oz., after 24 hours. Milk diluted with soda water may be given on the third day.

From this time on, Meulengracht or one of the gastric-type diets is given as tolerated, with added vitamins and iron. The patient is got up as soon as possible. The bowels are regulated with enemata and subsequently by mild aperients until they are working normally.

Complications that may arise are: perforation with peritonitis; retention of urine; chest complications; deep vein thrombosis; regurgitant vomiting; haemorrhage; paralytic ileus.

Later complications in addition to those already mentioned are epigastric discomfort, diarrhoea, palpitation, sweating, dizziness and faintness.

Note: when an ulcer has perforated, the abdomen is acutely tender and preparation of the field of operation may have to be carried out under general anaesthetic.

A Letter to the Editor

THE POWER OF THE GNC

MADAM.—After a period of 15 years, some spent nursing overseas and some in a non-nursing position in this country, I am now once again actively concerned with nursing and the training of nurses in Britain.

The fact that the nursing profession and the training of nurses is in a chaotic state is apparent to any thinking person. The standard of entry for nurse training, the dual streams of register and roll, the ever-increasing syllabus for State registration which must be covered in ever-shortening hours, and now the announced changes in the examinations for State registration, are some of the items contributing to this chaos.

In pondering over all this one inevitably wonders who is responsible, and one realizes that a great deal, if not all, is the responsibility of the General Nursing Council. On reaching thus far in my pondering, many questions arise in my mind. In view of the obvious power of the GNC, are the right people on this Council? Are there enough people in this body who really understand the problems and difficulties facing the nursing profession today? Why is it that changes appear continually to be made without any discussion as to their feasibility or advisability taking place beforehand with the people whose task it will be to implement these changes?

This brings me to other questions, the answers to which I should know already maybe, but I plead my years 'out' of the nursing world. Who is eligible for nomination to serve on the GNC? Who is allowed to nominate people to serve on the GNC? How many people are required to make one nomination? When should these nominations be made and what means is used to make known that the time has come to do this?

I am aware that the nursing profession is fairly well represented and that I do have an opportunity to vote at the time of the election, but only for those who are already nominated.

I wonder if I am alone in my ignorance and dissatisfaction concerning these matters, and if I am not alone whether it would be possible for an article to be written for the Nursing Times which would make these matters plain for concerned and responsible people who might wish to take intelligent action when the time arrives.

TALKING POINT

THE EDITOR HAS ASKED ME to answer the letter on the previous page about the GNC 'in a readable and factually accurate manner'. So here goes.

The GNC is housed just opposite the BBC, in a most lovely building with Adam fireplaces and painted ceilings. It is a sadly misunderstood body, as it is thought by nearly everyone to consist of retired matrons of London teaching hospitals. Nothing could be further from the truth. Half the Council is elected by you and me and all 17 of them are in jobs. Representing the general trained nurses are eight matrons and four tutors, a regional hospital board nursing officer and a superintendent of district nurses; a ward sister and a deputy chief male nurse represent the psychiatric nurses, and a matron the paediatric nurses. So 16 women and one man have been elected by the profession.

Candidates for election to the GNC (the elections occur every five years) must be nominated by six people whose names appear on the State register and who have to sign a nomination form. The nominated nurse must be working in a region (elections are on a regional basis), and there are representatives who are working in the psychiatric and paediatric hospitals.

If you are with me so far, you will see that the profession (you and me) has a very large say in who sits on this body and if the wrong people are on the Council, then it's our fault.

In addition to the 17 elected members there are 17 appointed members—12 appointed by the Minister of Health (two public health nurses, two tutors, one male nurse, one ward sister, three people with experience of HMC's and three others), three by the Minister of Education and two by the Privy Council. On the present Council, seven of these appointed members are also nurses.

Now that we've got these preliminaries over, we can get down to the more interesting part of the question. How much power has the GNC? Well, dear readers, certainly not as much as you seem to think in shaping the policies of nursing in this country. The only policy the GNC can lay down is for nurse training and even here it cannot make drastic changes without the consent of Parliament. In this it is not unlike the Established Church which, having drawn up and agreed a new prayer book in 1928, couldn't get it through the House of Commons. For 12½ years the GNC asked Parliament to reintroduce a minimal standard of education, and for 12½ years the Ministry of Health turned it down. During 12½ years (which included the first 10 years of the National Health Service) the coin of nursing has been steadily debased in the eyes of educationists all over the country and the overall quality of entrants has steadily declined, because the grammar school teachers have felt it hardly worth while for their brighter pupils to go into a profession with no educational entrance standard. Two factors saved the situation as far as nursing the patients was concerned: a tremendous influx of immigrant student nurses (the GNC rightly and properly admits people to its index of student nurses without reference to their colour, nationality or creed) and a great increase in the number of untrained nursing staff (over which, of course, the GNC has no control or jurisdiction).

Much of the blame for the 'chaotic state' our correspondent refers to must rest fairly and squarely on the shoulders of past Ministers of Health; some of it must be apportioned to the profession itself. We have been unrealistic and refused to face facts. All too often many of us haven't even bothered to find out the facts. But even apart from this amount of blame there is, surely, another factor which we cannot entirely ignore: this is an increasingly materialistic age and the concept of service is everywhere declining.

Members of the GNC devote very, very many hours of hard, unpaid work to furthering the interests of the profession. The profession itself remains largely apathetic and uninterested. The devoted spinster is rapidly disappearing; the marriage rate is rising and the marriage age is becoming lower. Salaries and conditions of service are nothing whatsoever to do with the General Nursing Council, nor are they concerned with staffing the hospitals. Most of our problems are not the concern of the GNC, however much its individual members are involved in them.

By the way, if I have succeeded in arousing the interest of any reader I might add that the meetings of the General Nursing Council are open to the public and the press. They are held on the fourth Friday of the month at 23, Portland Place, London, W.1, and, for the frivolous-minded among you, all the members (the gentlemen excepted) usually wear the most charming hats.

PUBLIC HEALTH

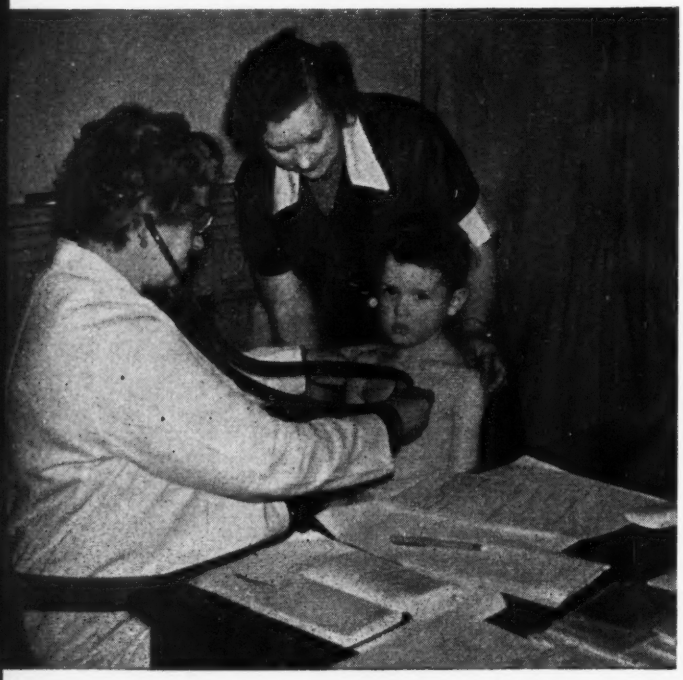
Auxiliaries in Health Visiting

Auxiliary workers are used for a wide range of duties in the Salford Health Visiting Service, as the accompanying pictures show. This discussion, by the superintendent health visitor, is based on a lecture given at a Royal College of Nursing refresher course.

BEATRICE M. LANGTON, D.N. (Lond.), Superintendent Health Visitor, Salford

An auxiliary tests urine in an antenatal clinic. These tests are much simpler since Clinitest came into being, but even before this auxiliaries undertook simple tests for albumen and sugar. Any suggestion of abnormality is referred to the health visitor.

ARE WE MAKING the best use of health visiting staff? This was the title of an article published nearly 14 years ago in a well-known medical journal[1]. That the subject is still topical is evidenced by the recommendations made in the working party report on health visiting in 1956, and supported by the Ministers of Health and Education in their joint circular issued in 1959.



In the school clinic the auxiliary assists the doctor, bringing in the children and records, seeing that spatulae and other requirements are at hand, taking temperatures if necessary.

The Ministers advise any local authority who has not already done so 'to take such action as seems appropriate for the improvement of their health visiting service, in particular in making sure that full use is made of the health visitor's capabilities and potentialities.' The circular mentions in particular that the health visitor should, as far as possible, be relieved of duties which do not call for her special skills in the school health service and at maternity and child welfare clinics.

It is accepted then, at the highest level, that there is at present a considerable waste of time and skill in the health visiting service and that something should be done about it.

Several authorities have already made some attempt to meet this problem, but on a limited scale. It is so often thought, for example, that if a health visitor gives up any clinic work at all only a State-registered nurse can replace her, whereas much of the work involved could be done by a lay assistant. The same principle applies to work in schools. It is no real economy to save the time of health visitors if by so doing we misuse the time and skill of the State-registered nurse.

Difficulties

Comparatively few authorities employ auxiliary workers in the health visiting service—for varying reasons. There may be the following problems.

1. Administration. It may be difficult to plan work to keep the auxiliary helper fully employed in the limited field in which she can practise.

2. Staff resistance. Some health visitors are resistant to the change that auxiliary helpers would make in their routine. This may be owing among other things to fear that they themselves—relieved of less skilled duties—would be expected to undertake additional responsibilities which they feel unable or unwilling to meet; or it may be owing to lack of confidence in lesser qualified workers—to fear of errors on the part of the subordinate for which they would feel responsible. Again, it may be due to psychological needs of the health visitor to work under pressure—to have the satisfaction of being 'overworked' and 'busy'.

3. Medical resistance. Also resistant to change are some assistant medical officers. It is difficult to know why, in this instance. Perhaps it is fear of imagined loss of prestige in being helped by a lay assistant instead of a health visitor or State-registered nurse, even though the assistance is unskilled or semi-skilled. As has been said before, rarely has more time been lost by qualified nurses than in assisting doctors in public health and school health departments, where there is less need for skilled nursing assistance than in any other branch of medicine.

4. Committee resistance. Lack of appreciation by committee members of the need to spend money on the employment of assistants for health visitors. This situation is not helped by the fact that many superintendents never attend committee meetings, and therefore have no opportunity to put the case to members from the health visiting or nursing viewpoint.

Most of these difficulties, and others, can be overcome, but this takes time.

There are other factors to be considered in setting up an auxiliary service.

A provision for the elderly is the foot hygiene service. Auxiliaries visit old people in their homes, wash the feet and trim the nails.

[All pictures are from a series of film slides showing the work of the auxiliary in Salford.]

Delegation

1. Delegation means more than redeployment of staff. Teamwork is an essential part of it. And it is not sufficient merely to provide a number of appropriately qualified workers to make up a team. It is accepted that the health visitor should be the leader, but she should avoid bringing to the team the hierarchy of the hospital. Teamwork is more a partnership—with the health visitor as senior partner, integrating and co-ordinating the work of the group; unobtrusively guiding and teaching the individual members of it.

2. Delegation means a sharing rather than shelving of responsibility. For example, a health visitor may delegate vision testing in one of her schools to an auxiliary worker who has had previous training in carrying out such tests. This does not mean that the health visitor is absolved of all responsibility in this field. There remains an obligation on her to see that the testing is properly carried out. She must therefore be prepared both to organize and supervise (and in so doing, incidentally, she enhances her own status).

3. The health visitor must have a clear understanding of the scope of work and limit of responsibility of those assisting her, and they in turn must have an equally clear understanding of the range and limits of their work.

This is important because it is sometimes difficult to strike a happy balance between the need to avoid misusing the skill of highly qualified personnel who are in short supply, and the danger of using those with too little skill for work beyond their competence. This would be dilution and not delegation and would result in deterioration in quality of work.

Relegation

Relegation is another matter, and concerns duties for which the health visitor should retain no responsibility. The issue of dried milk in clinics, for example, should be handed over completely in so far as selling, accounting, ordering, stocktaking and like duties are concerned.

In Salford auxiliary workers have been employed in the health visiting service for nearly 18 years. Two State-registered nurses were originally employed to assist in clinics, but it was soon realized that many duties, especially in the school health service, which did not need the services of a health visitor for their performance, did not need the services of a State-registered nurse either. So auxiliary workers were introduced, and the number gradually increased to the present strength of 15.

These auxiliary workers all possess certificates of first aid, home nursing and child welfare of the British Red Cross and St. John Ambulance Association, and all are members of the National Hospital Service Reserve. So they all know something of the fundamentals of asepsis, and in their 40 hours' training in hospital have had some practical experience in simple basic nursing procedures.

Film slides of auxiliaries' work were made by the health visiting staff in 1960, primarily to show to student health visitors undergoing practical training in Salford. The objective was to get students accustomed right from the outset to the realization that the State-registered nurses and auxiliary workers have their place in a health visiting service; that the health visitor, as a highly skilled person, should be able to select work suited to her qualifications and status, to organize and supervise, to delegate appropriate duties to others, and at the same time retain overall responsibility for the whole field of work. The slides illustrate not only the delegation of duties formerly undertaken by health visitors, but also new developments in the service which help the health visitor with some of her medico-social problems.

TODAY'S DRUGS

Majeptil (May and Baker)

This is thioproperazine, a tranquillizer similar in effect to chlorpromazine, although it shows less sedative, hypotensive and hypothermic activity. It is, however, a more potent anti-emetic. In states of excitement and disturbed or aggressive behaviour occurring in acute and chronic schizophrenia, mania and delirious states, it appears to be more effective than chlorpromazine, but side-effects are much more common and severe. The incidence of extrapyramidal disturbance is high. Parkinsonian rigidity may be intense, and the resulting akinesia may result in hypostatic pneumonia. In other patients, oculogyric crises, tonic spasms, restlessness, and respiratory disturbances may appear. Sweating, salivation and seborrhoea may be considerable. Less commonly, disturbances of accommodation, micturition and menstruation may occur.

In chronic schizophrenia, 'discontinuous' administration may be employed. Increasing daily amounts of up to 90 mg. are given, pausing when considerable extrapyramidal effects appear. The effective dosage is maintained for five days and the drug discontinued. Further courses may be given after five to seven days.

Barbiturates and other sedative drugs with a depressant action on respiration should not be given when extrapyramidal features are present.

Gestanin (Organon Laboratories)

This is allyloestroenol, an orally active synthetic progestogen. Tests have shown it to be satisfactory and well-tolerated. It is used in the treatment of menstrual disturbances such as menorrhagia, amenorrhoea, anovular menstruation, and true metropathia, of dysmenorrhoea, pre-menstrual tension, abortion syndrome and threatened abortion.

Considerable increase in libido was noted in some of the patients treated for premenstrual tension or dysmenorrhoea.

Care of the Dermatological Patient

D. I. McCALLUM, M.D., M.R.C.P.E., D.P.H.,
Consultant Dermatologist, Nottingham General Hospital

Herpes simplex (cold sores) affecting the face.

THE SKIN is the largest organ of the body, accounting for approximately 15 per cent. of its weight. It is exposed, as is no other organ, to both external and internal influences, and in health is designed to resist organismal, physical and chemical agencies and so to protect all underlying structures. This protective function is achieved by sebaceous secretion forming a greasy film over those areas that have hair, by the production of sweat, and by the presence of the stratum corneum of the epidermis which is well able to resist the effects of acids, alkalis and solvents, provided these are in dilute concentration and applied for relatively short periods.

The skin also plays an important part in regulating the body temperature at about 98°F. through the blood supply in the dermis, and through sweat which on evaporation cools the underlying surface. The third main function of the skin is subserved by the nerve corpuscles in the dermis which are responsible for perception of touch and temperature.

Classification of Skin Diseases

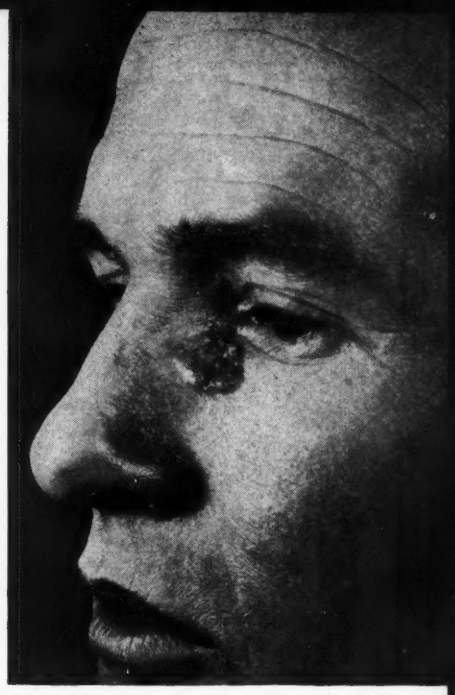
The following is a simplified classification of skin diseases with a few of the commoner conditions in each group.

A. Transmissible Diseases including herpes simplex, herpes zoster, molluscum contagiosum, warts, impetigo contagiosum, pediculosis, scabies and ringworm.

B. Non-transmissible Diseases

(1) Congenital and hereditary anomalies such as naevi, Von Recklinghausen's disease, ichthyosis, etc.
(2) Manifestations of systemic disease: systemic lupus erythematosus, scleroderma, dermatomyositis, the reticuloses, xanthomatoses.
(3) Malignant lesions: basal cell carcinoma, squamous cell carcinoma, malignant melanoma.
(4) Non-transmissible inflammatory conditions: dermatitis, psoriasis, pityriasis rosea, lichen planus.
(5) Chronic inflammatory conditions, including lupus vulgaris and lupus erythematosus.
(6) Allergic reactions, including eczema, urticaria, erythema nodosum and drug eruptions.
(7) Acne vulgaris and rosacea.
(8) Skin neuroses: dermatitis artefacta, neurodermatitis, some cases of pruritus ani et vulvae.
(9) Skin ulceration, whether due to defect of circulation or interference with the nervous supply.
(10) The bullous diseases: pemphigus vulgaris, pemphigoid and dermatitis herpetiformis.

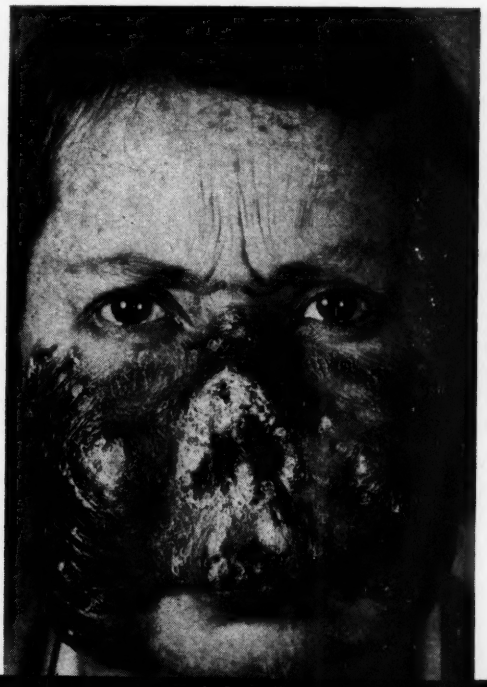
Let us consider the transmissible diseases listed under (A). Herpes simplex, herpes zoster, molluscum contagiosum and warts are caused by viruses, and of these only warts are so common as to cause administrative difficulty in treatment. Impetigo contagiosa due to streptococci or staphylococci, pediculosis or louse infestation, and scabies resulting from mite infestation, reach epidemic proportions in this country only under wartime conditions,



Basal cell carcinoma (rodent ulcer) with typical rolled edge.

Acne vulgaris showing comedones (blackheads) papules, pustules and cysts.

Lupus vulgaris prior to treatment with anti-tuberculous drugs. Note the destruction of nasal cartilage.



Chronic discoid lupus erythematosus affecting the batswing distribution of the face.

Pemphigus vulgaris in which the superficial bullae have stripped off leaving extensive raw areas on the skin and mucosal surfaces.

Varicose ulceration before treatment and two months after a weekly application of ichthopaste bandages.

and all are curable in a few days with appropriate out-patient treatment. Ringworm of the scalp has been controlled by treatment and by public health measures; tinea of the feet and groins responds reasonably well to topical applications, and presents a problem only in mining communities, where it is spread in the pit-head baths. Apart from these conditions, all the diseases listed above are neither infectious nor contagious.

The Leper Complex

From the dawn of history skin patients have had to contend with the stigma of being considered unclean, and this has had, and continues to have, a most deleterious effect on their psychological outlook, and may well set at nought the effects of treatment. It is the duty of those who care for skin patients to treat them with confidence and sympathy; where appropriate to impart the reassurance that the condition is neither infectious nor contagious; and to assure them that the results of adequate treatment of skin complaints bear favourable comparison with those in other branches of medicine. Where a nurse approaches the dermatological patient in an apprehensive or defeatist attitude, the condition will probably deteriorate into a chronic state and result in unnecessary invalidism.

What of the treatment of these conditions?

This can be divided into systemic therapy, local therapy and specialized branches such as X-ray therapy, ultra-violet light treatment, diathermy, cautery and minor surgery, occupational therapy and, where necessary, rehabilitation.

Systemic Therapy

Systemic therapy includes the use of oral steroids in such conditions as pemphigus vulgaris and systemic lupus erythematosus, the antibiotics for cellulitis, furunculosis and erysipelas, sulphonamides and sulphones for dermatitis herpetiformis, antihistamines for urticaria and to reduce irritation in the eczema-dermatitis group, anti-tuberculous drugs in lupus vulgaris, mepacrine and other anti-malarial drugs for discoid lupus erythematosus, and tranquillizers and sedatives for the large group of conditions in which psychogenic factors prevail. In recent years griseofulvin tablets have proved valuable in the control of many ringworm infections of scalp, trunk and nails.

Diet will vary from case to case, some cases of flexural eczema in obese patients requiring a reducing diet, others with an extensive exudative condition such as pemphigus requiring a high protein diet. In acne, greasy foods and excess of carbohydrates should be avoided and in rosacea those foods and beverages that would normally cause flushing of the face are the principal offenders. Iron and vitamin supplements are required in pemphigus vulgaris, extensive leg ulceration and in those conditions that have resulted in anaemia and cachexia.

Local Therapy

Local therapy will include cleansing methods. In any acute condition soap and water should be avoided and be replaced by liquid paraffin or other substance of such a bland character that it will not aggravate the already disrupted epidermis. It is not necessary to list the commoner topical medicaments or to describe the methods of application in this brief article. It is recommended that they are learnt by demonstration in skin outpatient departments or in skin wards.

Special mention should, however, be made of the use of Tubegauz for both localized and extensive dressings, in that it is easily applied and obviates the need for coarse bandages which tend to cause friction and irritation of areas that had not previously been involved. Occlusive dressings of bandages impregnated with ichthyol or coal tar paste have a wide field of usefulness in the treatment of such conditions as varicose ulcers and of neuro-dermatitis of the limbs, in that they are emollient, they support the affected areas and prevent deterioration that would result from scratching, bathing and self-medication with sensitizing agents. The correct technique of applying these bandages can readily be learnt by demonstration and practice.

Specialized Therapy

X-ray therapy is the treatment of choice of a proportion of skin neoplasms: in others surgical excision is preferred. Ultra-violet light is used in the treatment of some cases of acne vulgaris and in conjunction with tar in psoriasis. Diathermy and cautery are used in the treatment of warts, skin tags and some naevi. Occupational therapy can be very helpful in maintaining the morale and working capacity of those patients who are in hospital for a prolonged period, such as those with chronic psoriasis, neurodermatitis, etc., while rehabilitation is indicated where a patient will not be fit to return to his previous employment.

There is a proportion of cases in which no treatment is indicated, as the condition will clear spontaneously in due course (superficial cavernous haemangiomata, and multiple warts in a frail child) and in others because the end result is no better than the first (certain naevoid conditions of trunk and limbs).

There are many conditions, such as dermatitis of the hands, in which the rash may be quite localized, but where it is not feasible for the patient to carry out adequate treatment under home conditions. In such cases the provision of daily dressings at a hospital outpatient department or at a works surgery may well effect a cure in a matter of days in a condition that would otherwise persist indefinitely.

Many cases of housewife's dermatitis fall into this category, the patient giving a history that the fingers, hands and wrists have been involved for months or even for years in spite of treatment with hydrocortisone and other topical preparations. The patient usually realizes that water, alkalis and detergents have been mainly responsible for the trouble, and has tried to effect a cure by reducing wet work to a minimum, by rubbing in an ointment and by wearing rubber gloves. This is not enough. Daily dressings with the appropriate lotions, ointments, pastes or paints will control the eruption, but it is imperative that no soap or water should come in contact with the affected skin until the stratum corneum has been reformed. The parts should be gently cleansed with liquid paraffin and cotton wool, or with Ung. emulsificans aquosum; when the skin has apparently returned to normal, cotton gloves with rubber gloves on top should be worn for the subsequent month or two for any wet work.

In such cases the aim of treatment has been to bring the inflammation of the skin under control by removing the cause of the trouble, by the application of bland emollient preparations, and by avoiding the use of potential sensitizers of which medicated soaps, antiseptics of any sort, penicillin cream and antihistamine creams are but a few. When the inflammation subsides, the epidermis has an opportunity of re-establishing itself and of forming a normal stratum corneum which will in turn effectively protect the underlying cells.

In-patient Treatment

When inflammation of the skin is so extensive as to cause constitutional symptoms, complete rest is indicated, either at home or in hospital. In major hospital centres it is advisable that a ward should be set aside for the treatment of dermatological patients. They respond well to a calm, unruffled routine, and this is unlikely to be found in a general medical ward, where acute emergencies are in need of immediate attention and routine applications tend to be postponed until a favourable opportunity presents itself.

The theoretical objection to segregation of dermatological in-patients is that they may possibly feel that they are being isolated to safeguard other patients from contagion. This view can readily be dispelled by a competent sister and her staff.

The Causes of Flare-up

Occasionally patients under treatment fail to respond satisfactorily, or may even show deterioration without obvious cause. In such cases the first question to be answered is 'Has the medicament been responsible?' There is, somewhere in the community, a skin that will react adversely to almost any topically applied medicament, including such well-tried favourites as ichthammol, ammoniated mercury and tar. Change of the topical medicament may have the desired result, but if not the possibility of the base causing trouble should be considered, as in grease-sensitive patients. Other queries that arise include:

(a) is the patient cleaning the part with soap and water?

or (b) applying 'antiseptics' to the part to 'kill germs'?

or (c) scratching the lesion during sleep?

or (d) consciously maintaining the trouble for compensation purposes or because of some underlying neurosis?

or (e) taking some drug orally or by injection that might be responsible?

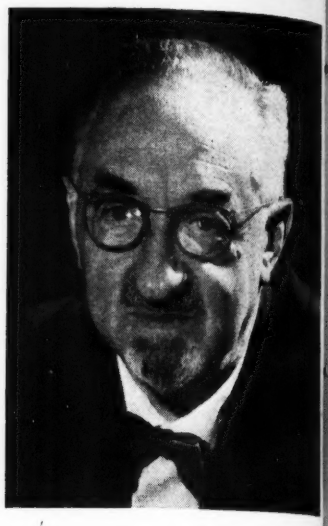
or (f) is the skin being aggravated by excessive warmth or by the presence of a rubber drawsheet?

In all such cases a full general medical investigation is indicated to exclude the presence of such conditions as internal neoplasms, diabetes, pulmonary tuberculosis, blood dyscrasia, hepatic or renal disease.

The nursing care of dermatological patients requires skill, patience and tact; in no branch of medicine is greater gratitude shown by the patient or greater satisfaction felt by the staff, than in one in which both symptoms and signs were apparent to the patient, and the response to treatment was observable throughout.

CRISIS IN NURSING—4

The Physician's View



HUGH GAINSBOROUGH, M.D., F.R.C.P.

LIFE holds for most of us many interests, but we tend to focus too narrowly on the line we primarily work in, and, for example, we forget to ask whether the crisis in nursing can in fact be isolated from world crisis. The daily newspaper with its never-ending discussion on the risk of war reduces us to helplessness and we only too easily prefer to study the lesser crisis by narrowing our angle of view, indeed by wearing blinkers.

Yet the solution of the nursing problem, discussed so vigorously and repetitively over 20 years, has largely become more difficult because of the changing social background. We ageing 'squares' are bequeathing a suicidal world, perhaps of our own making, to youngsters born in insecurity but better nourished, who mature physically, sexually and emotionally, but not educationally, earlier, and who consequently marry younger. Career women have become an anomaly, for no longer do young people consider any studentship or professional training as necessarily celibate: the pool of young bachelor women is disappearing while the demand for their work contribution in many spheres is steadily increasing.

Despite these additional and unforeseen changes, many of the known and stated causes of perennial shortage of nurses are still true, but the application of appropriate remedies demands a new urgency; on the one hand an acceptance and further study of these social trends, and on the other a desire to put our house in order.

Two Questions

Two questions must be asked. First, has the crisis really become deeper? There can be little doubt here: the evidence of closure of wards and shortage of staff nurses even in hospitals hitherto favoured for recruitment, and the consequence of this on the work and education of student nurses, speaks for itself. Secondly, why has so little been effectively done to carry out recommendations known to all? Responsibility for this failure must be widely placed on the nursing administrators, the nursing corporations, the medical profession and only too squarely on the Ministry of Health.

Though with the changing situation there is a great need for further study of the sociological and educational problems and for accurate knowledge of total nursing requirements for hospital and local authority services (see Minority Report 1948), there does exist a great deal of information about our problem, for indeed it is not a new one. Miss Evelyn Pearce in a privately circulated document (1945) starts off—'The plain fact about nursing is that a very large percentage of women long to nurse'. She then quoted figures showing that in St. Thomas's Hospital from 1860-1900 only 60 per cent. of the candidates completed their training.

Despite the huge reserve of willing and able women, the 'ugly' fact that women prefer marriage to nursing has never been accepted as the prime factor in our problem. Celibacy can no longer be a qualification for any grade of nursing; sheer necessity demands the wholehearted acceptance of this conclusion and marriage must not remain a synonym for wastage; and further, it is highly probable that the influx of married women into nursing would contribute an understanding of humanity that is still deficient in nursing and medicine.

This change of attitude must be extended to the acceptance of middle-aged women who, having brought up their children, are nowadays anxious to find a more rewarding occupation than domestic chores and who can be recruited either as students under conditions suited to them, or in other ways as in the moral story of 'Nurses Galore' (Nursing Times, June 9, 1961, page 744), and also in the re-recruitment, part or whole-time, of previously qualified nurses.

I ask myself, why does the nursing hierarchy so defensively resist any effort of progress against the dictates of tradition?* This resistance is matched by their insensitivity to both the needs of patients and those of young nurses. We have all tolerated the conditions of the open ward, the continuing early waking of patients, the noise, the restrictions of visitors, the lack of privacy (even prisoners have their own bedrooms!) for much too long, and we have consequently left ourselves open to the recent charges of inhumanity laid by the Minister of Health when he should be more constructively engaged on his part in a reorganization programme.

In face of an increasingly grave situation, persuasion of those who resist change is not enough. We need a reconstruction that cannot occur without a lead from the Minister of Health and this must be a compulsory demand for action on definite lines and backed by adequate finance. There is no time for a Royal Commission and one need only read, say, Miss Carter's and Miss Pearce's 'Reconsideration of Nursing' (Nursing Mirror, 1946), the Working Party Report and the Cohen Minority Report (1947-8) and of course the Nuffield Report of 1953 to find how much could be set in motion now. Let us look at some of the main points for a 'new' programme.

(1) Conditions of Employment

Women old enough to nurse must be freed from any discipline encroaching on their private lives, be freed from petty tyranny and regimentation in their working hours, be provided with adequate living conditions and given facilities for the enjoyment of their leisure in accordance with their own choice.

And yet the Ministry still ignores all we have learned about suitable conditions for underpaid but highly trained staff in its new Building Note on Accommodation for Nursing Staff. The minimum bed-sitting-room for sisters is only 140 sq. ft., sharing a bathroom and WC between two and a pantry between 18. Needless to say, the minimum is also the maximum and boards who ask for more will find their plans held up. Surely the Ministry must now think in terms of subsidized private self-contained flats and flatlets for all period-employed qualified staff, whether nurses, ancillary staff, men or women, single or married—and nothing less will do. For all staff including students a personnel officer independent of the nursing office is required in the larger institutions, to deal with health and welfare.

(2) The Work of Nurses and their Education

These are closely allied problems. Many of us have thought for a long time that recruitment and further employment of nurses would be promoted by the adoption of a two-year basic training scheme, with a marked differential pay increase on qualification. Basic nursing training is much misunderstood. The notion that nurses require instruction in every branch of medicine is as stupid as it is fallacious. There are, though rarely stated, definite principles of nursing which when learnt and understood will enable a nurse to enter any branch of nursing with minimum additional instruction. It does not mean that the nurse must be taught (and fail to learn) detailed chemistry, anatomy, pathology, etc., in order to understand what she is doing. How many matrons and sister tutors who can drive a car well know how it works, what is a torque rod or a thrust bearing?

Basic training does however imply that facilities must be given for deeper education of more intelligent men or women and that in-service education should be continually organized and available in third and subsequent years of employment. Preliminary training should be shortened, and training must be essentially bedside and practical. How much notice has been taken of a most intelligent article in the Nursing Times published 11 years ago? (J. Bourne. Nursing Times, 1950, July 22, 750.)

Doctors must not be asked to give lectures. They must be employed as staff of the nursing school, they need not be specialists, and they must work with the nurse instructors in and out of the wards with a complete understanding of the educational aim. The nursing schools should be run by nurses and doctors who must accept responsibility for educational policy and who must themselves learn how to evoke from their students a living interest; and further, examinations should be decentralized and become the responsibility of those actively engaged in teaching.

(3) Economy in Nurses' Work

Nurses' work tends to expand unreasonably on the basis of reasonable medical requirements. Greater co-operation between doctor and nurse could for example cut down much complicated charting or multiple administration of medicines—and to the benefit of the patient. The methods of automation used particularly in the USA, central supplies, proper disposal methods, etc., can reduce many time-wasting chores, leaving nurses more time for contact with patients.

Hospital planning here remains at an unimaginative level, and as far as I know, only one experiment is proposed in new plans to consider graded nursing requirements in relation to suitably grouped patients. Finally, Professor T. McKeown's idea of an integrated hospital community is of the greatest importance to the future of nursing in all its branches.

Now is the time for Action

The Ministry should now bring out a new charter for nursing reflecting the character of this age—it must lay down standards of work, education, and living conditions to provide an adequate and attractive nursing service. Better a few mistakes than a further decade of obstruction and procrastination. The onus must then be placed on all boards and hospital management committees to hold discussions with all their matrons in order to inform the Ministry of the steps they consider necessary for the carrying out of the Ministry proposals, and to state the grants or other aid needed where their own organizational facilities are inadequate.

MENTAL HEALTH

Student mental nurses at Holloway Sanatorium discussed communications in the ward at the end of a series of study days. They considered the aim of good communications, what was likely to happen when communications were poor, and how ward organization could help.

A ward discussion meeting in progress.

Communications in the Ward

BENITA ALLEN, Student Mental Nurse, Holloway Sanatorium, Virginia Water, Surrey

TWELVE second-year student mental nurses at Holloway Sanatorium held a discussion on the last day of a series of 16 study days. The discussion was divided into three parts under these headings.

(a) The aim in establishing good ward communications.

(b) The unhealthy attitudes which are likely to arise in a ward where communications are poor.

(c) The importance of ward organization in achieving effective communications. How would the group carry this out?

Under the first heading it was decided that the aim in establishing good intra-ward communication was to build a firm relationship between all levels of the ward team. In this way a stable environment would be created for the patient by giving him a consistent approach and thereby increasing his confidence in the staff. Also it would be possible to relieve tension caused by inter-personal conflict among the staff themselves by having frank daily discussions in the ward. When really good communications exist in a ward it is possible to ensure that all the team are fully conversant with ward routine, diagnoses and treatment of patients, and are thereby confident that they are carrying out their duties with the maximum benefit to the patient.

Distress to the Patient

Having got the aims quite clear the group went on to discuss unhealthy attitudes which are likely to arise when communications are poor.

It was agreed that the worst effect was distress caus to the patient—not necessarily by bad nursin although this could happen if junior nurses had n been adequately instructed by their senior staff, b by his feelings of insecurity caused by an inconsiste approach.

Members of the ward team also suffer in this b situation: the sister because she feels the work is n being carried out efficiently; the deputy sister becau she is not in possession of all the facts when she tak her turn in charge of the ward, and the juniors becau they are unsure of themselves and therefore fe resentful and unhappy.

Finally the group agreed that good ward organiz tion was essential for effective communication and wer on to decide how they would carry this out.

Key Figure—Ward Sister

The students were unanimous in stating that the k figure in the ward team was the sister—that she cou make or mar the entire programme. However, havin the ideal sister, confident and efficient, it would be great help to continuity if her hours of duty enable her to be in the ward for five-and-a-half consecutiv days a week. This could be achieved within the 44-hou week by working eight hours daily from Monday t Friday and four hours on Saturday morning. It wa strongly felt that patients and staff would benefit b this continuity, and feelings of insecurity inevitably caused by changes of administration would be done away with.

Daily Ward Discussion

A daily ward discussion between the sister and her nurses should be held at a time arranged to fit in with ward routine. This need not be a lengthy affair, but is essential if good communications are to be maintained. At this meeting the sister reports any new directives from the hospital administration, all changes in treatment, makes any suggestions she may have to improve standards of nursing, and deals with any queries or problems from the staff. If a good relationship exists between the nursing team they should all feel free to offer constructive criticism, for by airing personal differences much tension can be relieved, and a happier, more co-operative team created as a result.

Patients and staff at a meeting.

Weekly Ward Talk

The ward doctor is of course responsible for outlining the treatment and method of approach towards his patients. He also has a responsibility to teach his nurses whenever possible. This is most easily achieved by holding a weekly ward talk given by the doctor at which should be present not only the nursing staff but also all other members of the hospital staff who have contact with his patients, such as the psychiatric social worker, the occupational therapist, the physiotherapist and the dietitian. Much is contributed to the general pool of knowledge by members of departments outside the ward, as patients often react differently in changed environments.

There seemed to be a number of meetings to be fitted into the ward organization, but the group felt that one more, perhaps more important than all the others, should be arranged. This was a general ward meeting for all patients and staff to be held weekly. If pressure of duties should restrict staff attendance at any meetings this one should be regarded as most important. Here patients have an outlet for any complaint they may wish to make about staff, routine, or ward equipment and any suggestions they have for improvement. Patients should arrange their own weekly programme including entertainments and ward chore rota lists if they are well enough to do so.

'Communications'

Good communication is achieved not only by ward discussions, but also by the ward sister personally greeting each new member of the staff, explaining ward routine and satisfying herself that the new member is fully conversant with the duties she will be required to carry out. This applies to all staff, domestic and nursing, and helps to create a confident atmosphere. She also encourages her senior staff to teach their juniors whenever the occasion arises.

Maximum Benefit

Finally, in an ideal hospital, good communications should exist not only at a ward staff level, but from the physician superintendent, the matron and the administrative staff right through to the patient—thus ensuring the maximum benefit to, and most efficient therapeutic environment for, the patient.

'Mental Health'

THERE IS MUCH OF INTEREST to mental-trained nurses (and other nurses, too) in the summer issue of Mental Health, published by the NAMH. The editorial declares that forebodings after the Minister's speech on the closing of mental hospitals were unnecessary and that there will be plenty of work for mental nurses in future—only it will be different: more adventurous; more stimulating.

Mr. Stanley Moore, chief male nurse, Warlingham Park Hospital, commenting on his hospital's experiment in allocating two nurses (one of either sex) to work among patients in the community outside the hospital, remarks on the interesting effect which the experience had on the nurses involved. They saw more clearly the effects on relatives of a mentally ill person in the household. It became clear to them that 'great personal and professional satisfaction were derived from their contribution within the community' and they returned to the hospital seeing in the patient 'a more positive potential for discharge from hospital to the service now existing in the community . . .'

Letters to the Editor

We welcome your views—but please could you express them in not more than 250 words? Most of the letters this week have had to be shortened. We hope we have not destroyed our correspondents' arguments, but unless letters are short, we cannot print a representative selection.

THAT EXTRA WEEK

MADAM.—I am a middle-aged ward sister engaged upon very active nursing. I am a very tired woman and am delighted at the prospect of having an extra week's holiday.

Can Wrangler and your indignant correspondents really have no idea of the conditions prevailing in the average non-teaching hospital?

The 44-hour week sounds very luxurious but its implementation usually leaves much to be desired. Long spans of split duties prolonged still further by artful little half-hour breaks are still very much the vogue.

The average student looks at her ward sister and sees no incentive to carry on nursing—in hospital, at any rate. If we want girls to enter the profession we must provide a goal which appears to be desirable and to offer progress. Longer holidays to compensate for late duties and week-end working are an incentive.

It would be interesting to compare student wastage in hospitals providing good conditions for trained staff against those in which sister is just 'another pair of hands'.

Our publicity must improve. We must have something in competition to offer the prospective candidate. Above all, the hospitals must concentrate on keeping the staff they have at present.

MADAM.—There has been considerable correspondence and criticism of the forthcoming additional week's leave for trained staff and third-year nurses—however, I have not yet met the ward sister who disapproves. Harassed and overworked, they are only too thankful to have another seven days to restore their sense and sanity before returning to their toil and troubles.

The situation is acute in many wards. Could we not direct our energies to solving the problem of shortage of staff? Is there any guarantee that there will be an improvement in the next few years? Criticisms have been levelled at the nursing service we are giving now. Everywhere there's an awareness that all is not well. As ward sisters we carry on, hopeful of the day when we will have time to run our wards as we would wish and not be the poor harassed souls we are, pleading for more pairs of hands that are rarely forthcoming.

If everyone was really convinced that the existing standard of nursing care was not adequate, that we were not giving the service to our patients which they deserve, something might be done about it. So long as the shortage of nurses remains an individual problem we will get nowhere.

As a member of the Ward and Departmental Sisters Section of the Royal College of Nursing and a member of the Scottish Regional Committee, it would be of value to have other people's opinion so that we may put the machinery at our disposal into action.

MADAM.—I note that in certain circles it is felt that the extra week's leave which was recently granted will only create a greater shortage of nurses.

Nurses are, in general, overworked, due to understaffing. I realize that, but, for a change, let us use logic and not a lot of pseudo-professional maudlin sentimentality when looking at this problem. We are understaffed because the profession is basically out of contact with reality.

We are underpaid and, in general nursing in particular, we are not infrequently unpaid for service rendered. Why this should be peculiar to our profession, and not apply to others, I cannot see. Barristers and the like have no qualms about being pa according to the service rendered, why not us?

At top level, too much attention paid to the outlook of the midd aged, and not enough to the needs the normal youngster. They ne affection and independence, two the essential psychological nee which, to my mind, are sadly lacki in the outlook of many of our admi strators. The overbearing attitude many of our ranks towards the juniors is a standing music-hall jok Unfortunately, this is a defence mec anism employed by the inefficie Split duties do little to encourage th youngster to lead a normal off-du life, which is so necessary if one is remain balanced. We have too ma monomaniacs in the profession ready.

MADAM.—Having been on holid I have just read the Nursing Times August 21—and it makes interesti reading, especially in the matter the unjustified assumptions made two of your contributors.

'I am afraid', says Wrangler, in h diatribe against the increase in ann leave, 'that the responsible membersh of the College are going to be d appointed'. Well, who are th people she designates as the 'respon ble' ones? Most Branch meeti consist of the local matrons, a fe tutors, a sprinkling of other sta plus the retired nurses of the neig bourhood—usually representing abo one-twentieth of Branch membersh Is their opinion to be regarded representative of nurses as a whol I think not. The College can o claim that approximately one-sixt of the total number of trained nurs are College members, and if only on twentieth attend Branch meetings, cannot see that this can be regard as an important expression of opinio

'Bring in new ideas', says Mr. Anthony. I have news for him. Th hierarchical pattern of life in th nursing profession extends even College Branch meetings, and wo betide the young and junior memb who seeks to challenge the wishes the Establishment! She would have no chance to do so in any case, since the Establishment runs the meetings, the rank and file members being simply regarded as so many 'yeas' or 'nays'. Mr. Anthony fears 'a drawback to recruitment'—but the younger members of the profession have clearly shown by witholding their membership that the College does not fulfil their ideas as a professional organization. If they join at all, they join only for the indemnity cover the College provides—and they say so quite openly.

[WRANGLER writes: 'What I actually wrote was ". . . that the responsible membership of the College is going to be disappointed . . . ". The matrons and tutors who do attend the Branch meetings are demonstrating a sense of responsibility by actually attending and it is they, after all, who are responsible for working out these impossible hours of duty to see that the patients are adequately catered for. I have every sympathy with hard-worked and harassed ward sisters, especially for those in teaching hospitals where, on the whole, "other nursing staff" are not employed. But what we want, surely, is for more ward sisters to attend Branch meetings to express their views and put forward constructive suggestions in a situation which ultimately will affect each one of us—especially should we ourselves have the misfortune to become patients.'—EDITOR]

CRISIS IN NURSING

MADAM.—I would like to endorse the view of the surgeon in the second article on Crisis in Nursing, with regard to the suggestion of a body of people to visit a particular hospital when in difficulty.

So many good ideas are put forward and conferences held on the subject, but is it not time more action was taken? Such a body coming in from the outside might be able to help the matron with a solution to the particular problem, and add strength to any request she may wish to make to the hospital management committee. Where there is a nursing shortage which continues, a vicious circle is produced as nurses in training are frightened off when they see the difficulties under which their seniors have to carry on.

Has it not been taken for granted for too long that nursing staff make up for deficiencies or shortages of ancillary, clerical or domestic staff. This is only achieved by nursing staff working over the 44-hour week, very often with no hope of the time being made up. The Ministry's comment on overtime is that it is due to lack of organization.

In cases of shortage due to sickness amongst nursing or other staff, employment of relief staff is rarely permitted, and perhaps this is another channel which such a group of people as Mr. Malkin suggests, might explore.

CONFUSED LEADERSHIP

MADAM.—It would appear from the Nursing Times during the last few weeks that organization within the nursing profession is in a parlous state. The situation between the NCN and the RCN seems to be coming to a head, and from what appears on the surface in your journal, one can only conjecture at what is going on underneath. The leading articles, letters, statements, etc., indicate that the tug-and-pull, the rivalries and divided loyalties of the most senior members of the profession are causing more disruption and conflict within nursing than ever the trades unions cause with their intrusions and infiltrations.

In your issue of August 4, we are treated to a polite 'slanging match' between Clare Mann and Florence Udell, both firmly entrenched in the opposite camps of the NCN and the RCN.

The latest shilly-shallying of the leaders of the profession has already been mentioned in your columns—the introduction of an extra week's holiday through the award of the Industrial Court. While the membership of the College was practically unanimous in its verdict of no reduction in working hours at the present time, its representatives on the Staff Side were obviously agreeing to the demands of the trades unions, who will shriek for anything for propaganda purposes. What happened to the majority vote of nine held by the nurses and midwives on the Staff Side?

To anyone who understands the machinery and ramifications of organization, the antics of the leaders of the NCN and RCN are confusing enough, but what of the average nurse looking for leadership in a strong, united professional organization. She can only see matrons, retired matrons, chief nurses of this and that, superintendents, supervisors, more retired nurses, etc., running around in circles getting nowhere—fast! Has it ever occurred to these people to admit that they know very little about the principles of organization, and could profit from the advice and guidance of those who do know? But can anyone tell the nursing hierarchy anything?

SHORTAGE OF TUTORS

MADAM.—As a student tutor who has recently completed the first year of the course may I say how interested I was in the article Shortage of Nurse Tutors (Nursing Times, September 8). During the past year I have visited training schools in England and Scotland for practice teaching sessions and observation visits. After noting the conditions under which some tutors work I am only surprised that the shortage is not more acute.

To my horror I heard in one hospital that matron did most of the administrative work of the school—deciding on textbooks, equipment, etc.—even choosing the colour scheme for the tutor's office. In another school the principal tutor greeted her recently qualified assistant with a sheaf of notes obviously prepared a decade ago and said, 'You will teach from these notes.' I should find it very difficult to reconcile this attitude to teaching with the lectures on education, developing an individual technique, etc., given us during the course.

Am I being very naive in assuming that the two instances cited are isolated examples of what some tutors have to bear, or am I spending a great deal of time, effort and the country's money in preparing myself for a situation in which I shall not have to use any initiative or imagination either in the planning or presentation of my material?

NALGO

We regret an error in a footnote to a letter last week when we described the National and Local Government Officers Association as being a member of the TUC. Although registered as a trade union, NALGO is not, in fact, a member of the Trades Union Congress. The other facts mentioned were correct.

SOUTH WEST METROPOLITAN ANT

Methods of Teaching Nurses

This is the first part of two series of extracts from the report on an investigation into methods of nurse teaching in 17 hospitals. It is referred to in this week's leading article. The report is obtainable without cost from the South West Metropolitan ANTC, 40 Eastbourne Terrace, London, W.2.

The Syllabus

SEVERAL TUTORS commented on the difficulties inherent in the present GNC syllabus and examinations; in their view, and we agreed with them, subjects of considerable importance and interest to the student nurse could not be introduced sufficiently early in the course because the teaching time available had to be devoted almost wholly to the subjects required for the Preliminary Examination. On the other hand, a number of tutors with whom we raised this point had no criticisms of the present syllabus or examinations. The tutors in the four mental hospitals, however, thought that the new experimental syllabus, which allows a better integration of all the subjects in the curriculum and does not impose a 'subject' examination at the intermediate level, was proving to be more interesting, and more rewarding, to both tutors and students, than the orthodox syllabus. We cannot help feeling that, though some tutors in the general hospitals realize the need to introduce some teaching of the basic principles of medical treatment, and of the concept of the nature and causation of disease early in the training, many tutors are reluctant to begin what are regarded as 'senior' subjects until their students have overcome the hurdle of Parts 1 and 2 of the Preliminary Examination.

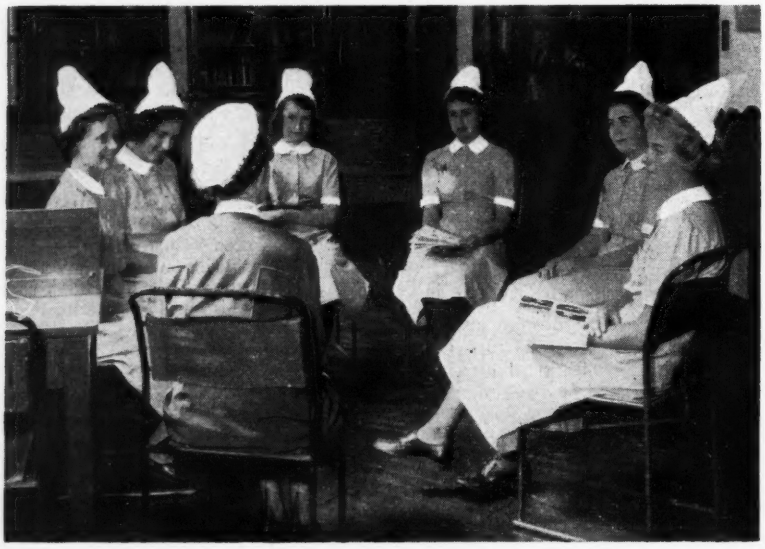
Programme of Work

We were very much impressed with the careful programme of each student's work and study which had been drawn up in one training school; it showed clearly and in full detail all the ground the student was expected to cover during her whole period of training so that both teacher and taught could tell, at any given moment, what ground had been covered, what was the work of the moment and what remained to be done. Other training schoo too, had given much thought to devis a detailed three-year curriculum but it w obvious that, in some, the importance planning the training as a clearly conceiv and continuing process was not sufficient recognized.



THEORETICAL TEACHING

The Lecture

We saw every variety of theoretic teaching. On the whole, the doctors gav straight, informative lectures, very muc perhaps, in kind, if not in content, whi they would give to their medical studen But there was a great difference betwe a quick, clear lecture delivered from th written text and ending with a perfunctor 'Any questions?' which were rarely, if ev asked, and a more discursive, informa lecture with illustrations drawn from cas known to the students and made lively b anecdotes and practical allusions. Th kind of lecture might end with a battery questions from the highly interest students and a sharing with them of th lecturer's ripe experience. We saw th happen twice with a class of very averag students but each time there was a strong liaison between theory and practice; th lecturer took the students round his wa or special department and they were ex pected to connect their work in the wa with what they were learning in the clas room. It might be added that at this sam hospital the tutors had established th happiest relations with the students so th they looked upon a lecture not as som thing merely to be listened to, but a something in which they could share, an by sharing, learn much more.

Very sensibly, most of the tutors co cluded that the doctors gave the studen sufficient formal lecturing and they them selves practised rather what might be called class-teaching, at the best getting most o the information out of the students b skilful questioning, finding out gaps in th students' knowledge, seeing that the infor mation given was thoroughly understood linked to what had gone before and mad preparatory to what was to come next Sometimes the information given was jus what the students had in their textbook and did little but make the path of know ledge easier for them but, at its best, b its arrangement, the choice of material and the skilful use of questions, this clas teaching accomplished much. The days when the teacher simply read from a prepared script have evidently completely departed. The pace seemed to us sometimes very slow. We would urge the necessity for more speed, not to cram in more information but to make time for more illustrations, examples, anecdotes, questions and so forth and to ensure, by skilfully disguised repetition and variation, that the material has been really mastered and has sunk into the student's consciousness.

Class Teaching

It was obvious to us that much of the class-teaching suffered in quality from the small size of the classes. Tutors seem to be unnaturally afraid of large numbers and many of them gave 10 students as the largest number they could deal with adequately in a class. But we feel that because of this they miss much of the interest and mental stimulus which class-teaching should arouse and this was borne out by what we saw in the various hospitals. We can say with truth that the bigger the class we saw, the better the teaching and although the biggest classes were in a hospital where admittedly the students were of first-rate quality, the same was true of the more ordinary run of students. It is indeed quite impossible to attempt class-teaching of any value with groups of three, four, five or six students and our investigation showed clearly that this was one of the insuperable difficulties experienced by the very small training school. We ourselves would think 20 to 25 the optimum number for class-teaching, although the highly skilled teacher can deal with 30 or even more.

The Project

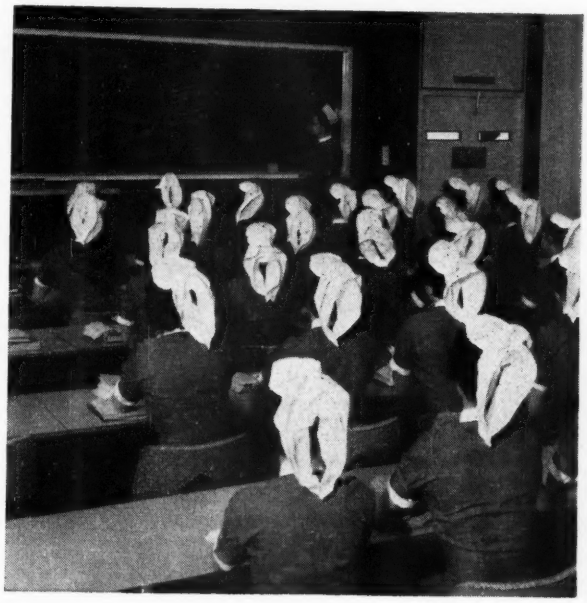
The term 'project' is apparently used in nurse training schools for any kind of exercise in which the student gathers together her own information, arranges it as she likes and sets it forth in as arresting a form, diagrammatic or oral, as she chooses. The students obviously enjoyed this kind of work and where it was combined with case histories, for which they showed much enthusiasm, they obviously felt that they were doing work which had much point. Even the dullest of them came alive when telling of Mrs. X. or Mr. Y. and it was obvious how much they enjoyed adding all the human details of the patient's life and background. In this way what they were doing seemed to acquire new meaning for them, reminding us anew that nursing is primarily concerned with people, that to the nurse people matter most, and that all the theoretical knowledge she must acquire must somehow be connected with the real people whom it is going ultimately to serve.

Visual Aids

So far as we could see, in all this theoretical teaching there was adequate, sometimes profuse, use of illustrations, diagrams, microscopes, films and the like; and in every kind of class the blackboard was much, and sometimes very skilfully, used. The hospitals were well equipped with every kind of visual and other aids and none of the tutors had any complaints on that score.

The Inadequate Library

It was quite otherwise with their libraries; often neither the rooms nor the supply of books were at all adequate and one tutor complained that year after year her request for £100 to spend on books was met by an inadequate grant of £20. Training school authorities who have the allocating of money granted for nurse training must realize that student nurses need a quiet, spacious pleasant room, well supplied with reference and standard textbooks, if they are to cultivate habits of independent, really studious work.



Private Study

Not once, when students doing private study were observed, did they seem to be doing anything but sit with books in front of them. More active forms of independent study, such as marking and listing important points, résumés of the material to be assimilated, testing their knowledge of what they had learnt, were conspicuous by their absence; not a pencil was to be seen at work! Certainly, in children's schools at the moment it is hard to disabuse pupils, and their parents, of the idea that they are 'working', when sitting passively with the printed page before them; but if these same children reach the student stage without being cured of this misapprehension, there seems little possibility of success for them. Indeed it was a matter of great curiosity to us as to when the students did the real hard learning of facts which must be necessary. Is this always done in the privacy of their own study bedrooms? Quite rightly, tutors did not, on the whole, supervise private study but considered that their students should be able to use it adequately and responsibly when left to themselves.

Note-taking

It would seem that some instruction in methods of independent work, as of note-taking, might well be given in the preliminary training school and a few hospitals did this. The attitude of the tutors to their students, especially to those less well endowed, is so kindly and so helpful that there is, we believe, a danger of spoon-feeding and of too little insistence on individual, independent effort. The student nurse should have her abilities, intellectual as well as practical and moral, stretched as far as they can go, and we believe that the theoretical work would be proportionately more stimulating if this were so.

The Aim of Training

Sometimes we suspected that the whole course of training aimed rather at the passing of an examination than at the development of a well-endowed and well-qualified nurse. This suspicion made us honour all the more those training schools where matrons and tutors cared passionately for high standards of nursing care and put them before the more measurable results of examinations. Many of the tutors found the ground to be covered very heavy and far too wide and it would seem that there is need for much consultation and discussion on these questions of syllabus, curriculum and examination papers, consultation and discussion in which those who are doing the actual teaching should take a large part.

Between the Blocks

Most of the hospitals visited followed the block system of training, either wholly or in part, and they were faced with the problem of filling the gap between the blocks and keeping the student nurse in touch with theoretical work during that time. One very good training school preferred the system of study days for this very reason. Some hospitals left this problem for the student nurse herself to solve; others gave examination questions to be answered from time to time. To us one of the most successful attempts at a solution was the 'Dalton Plan'. Each student was given a written assignment, or portion of work, to be mastered within a certain time; lines of study and textbooks, or other material, were suggested and the nurse left to get on with the work; some form of test, an essay or a question, was given with the assignment and this had to be handed in by a given date. After the tutor had seen the work, the student nurse came to have it returned to her, when all difficulties could be cleared up and individual needs met. One student, for instance, had obviously found the textbook suggested beyond her; she was sent away to do the same work again, armed with a textbook written on simpler lines and encouraged by the tutor's explanation of some of her individual difficulties.

Best Means of Teaching

The weakness we found in some training schools was not lack of variety of method so much as that no method, old or new, was exploited to the full. Especially, perhaps, was this true of what most teachers would claim to be the basic method, that of class-teaching. If this is not well done no amount of 'modern methods' will make up for it and it seems to us that any tutor who has not thoroughly mastered the art of class-teaching will never be of the highest quality. This is still the best means of arousing interest, of communicating ideas, of exploring the content of each other's minds, teachers and taught, of stimulating inquiry, of relating the matter in hand to larger issues. Nothing can be more enjoyable than the repartee of quick question and answer, of the play of mind upon mind, of the shared exploration of new knowledge. Much of the material, perhaps, could be got out of a textbook but it is transmuted into something rare and lively by the teacher's (and the students') personality and given a relevance to life, whether in or out of hospital, by the breadth of her knowledge and the wisdom of her methods. Class-teaching is not 'new' but blessed indeed are those students whose tutors are masters of this method. The mental atmosphere of such classes can arouse even the deadly dull student to something approaching real life and enthusiasm; but this is not easy. The tutor must do a great deal of thinking and preparation to achieve this; she must set herself day by day to improve herself in the art; she must give herself completely to the execution of her task.

It is not enough to 'have' discussion groups. They may be successful and achieve their purpose or they may not. A discussion group is something much more than sitting round in a circle and accepting random ideas thrown out by the students. It is a very difficult thing indeed to lead a group discussion with skill and effectiveness.

The project, or practical exercise, is in great vogue at the moment. Here, again, the temptation is to accept all the information that the student gives as being valuable because she has given it instead of its being given to her. While there is the obvious necessity for encouragement and kindness in handling students in these situations, they must be helped to criticize their material, its relevance and correctness and its arrangement as a logical whole.

OBITUARY

Mrs. K. A. L. B. Mucklin (née Ballans)

We regret to announce the sudden death, on September 10, of Mrs. K. A. L. B. Mucklin (née Ballans). A senior colleague writes: 'It is comforting to know that after so many years of illness, she was latterly able to return to full-time nursing; she was actually on duty at the Peterborough Memorial Hospital when she was taken ill, and she died at the Atkinson Morley's Hospital a few days later. Her gay and courageous spirit and her keen interest in the welfare of patients and staff alike made Mrs. Mucklin a beloved colleague to all who worked with her.'

Miss R. E. C. Warnes

We regret to announce the death at the age of 40 of Miss Ruby Eileen Croucher Warnes, matron for the past five years of the William Julien Courtauld Hospital, Braintree, Essex. Miss Warnes trained at Lambeth General Hospital, 1939-43, and did her midwifery training at the Hospital for Mothers and Babies, Woolwich, and the Maternity Nursing Association, London. She became midwifery sister at King's College Hospital, London, and subsequently assistant matron at Felixstowe General Hospital, and at the Ipswich and East Suffolk Hospital (Heath Row Wing). Miss Warnes was a member of the Royal College of Nursing.

Mrs. F. Wilson

We regret to announce the sudden death, recently, of Mrs. Frances Wilson, deputy matron of the Bristol Royal Hospital for Sick Children. Mrs. Wilson first went to the hospital in 1938, and served during the war as sister-in-charge of the Emergency Hospital at Easton House. After the war she was successively housekeeping sister and unqualified sister tutor, and in 1950 was appointed deputy matron. Mrs. Wilson was due to retire this autumn.

APPOINTMENTS

United Bristol Hospitals

THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS have appointed as work study officer Miss Betty Hall, R.G.N., S.C.M., S.T.D. Miss Hall is a trainee of Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, and did her midwifery at the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, and St. Mary's and City of Manchester District Midwifery Training School; she took the Sister Tutor Diploma at the Royal College of Nursing. Miss Hall has worked at a Rollier Clinic at Leysin, Switzerland, and after two years as medical ward sister at Salford Royal Hospital she became sister tutor at the Royal Masonic Hospital, London, and afterwards principal sister tutor, St. Luke's Hospital, Bradford. For the past six years she has been an examiner for the General Nursing Council, and is a member of the Leeds Area Nurse Training Committee. Miss Hall will attend a course in work study at the King Edward's Fund Hospital Administrative Staff College in Bayswater before going to Bristol.

St. Helen Hospital, Barnsley

MISS EDITH LEES, S.R.N., S.C.M., H.V. CERT. NURSING ADMIN. CERT. (RCN), has been appointed matron. Miss Lees trained at the General Hospital, Barnet (she was silver medallist), and the Royal Halifax Infirmary. She took the Housekeeping Certificate at Liverpool Royal Infirmary. During the war she served in QARANC as sister and senior sister, and holds the rank of Lt. Colonel, QARANC (TA). Miss Lees became a sister at Kershaw Hospital, Oldham, and later assistant matron, Memorial Hospital, High Wycombe, Bucks. She took the Health Visitor Certificate at Leeds University, serving as a health visitor in Yorkshire, before being appointed deputy superintendent health visitor, City of Nottingham, and later, assistant superintendent health visitor to Lancs. County Council.

All good wishes to a nurse who has accepted the challenge of a post which drew attention nationally to an unfortunate situation.

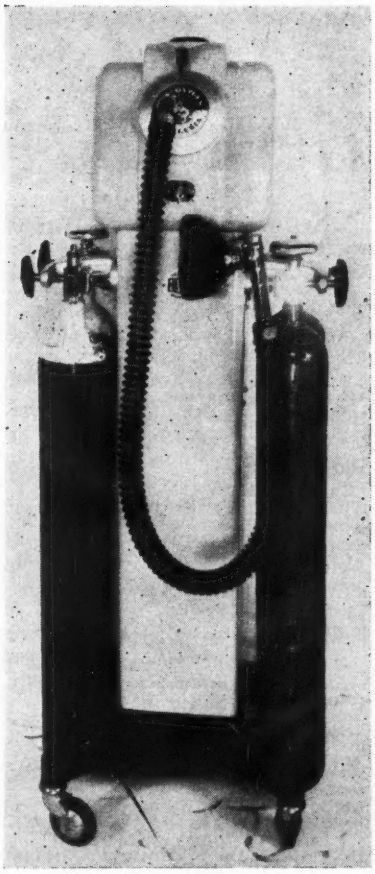
Ayr Hospitals: Combined Training School

MR. WILLIAM G. MCMILLAN, S.R.N., R.M.N., S.T.D. (HULL), has been appointed principal tutor. Mr. McMillan trained at the Crichton Royal Hospital, Dumfries, and the Whittington Hospital, London. He has held posts as deputy charge nurse at the Lancaster Moor Hospital, and charge nurse, Elizabeth Martland Unit, Oldham and District General Hospital. Since taking his tutor's diploma he has been assistant tutor at Clifton Hospital, York, and principal tutor, St. Edward's Hospital, Cheddleton, Staffordshire.

MIDWIFERY

The Lucy Baldwin Nitrous Oxide and Oxygen Machine

DOROTHY B. SPENGLER, S.R.N., S.C.M., M.T.D.,
Midwifery Tutor in Sole Charge, Victoria Maternity Hospital, Barnet



THE NITROUS OXIDE and oxygen machine has become very popular with those who have had the opportunity to use it.

On October 22, 1958, the machine that was later to be named the Lucy Baldwin came to our unit and from then to August 31, 1960, 803 cases were recorded in the Victoria Maternity Hospital under the direction of the medical staff. For two months we were without the machine when it was taken back for slight alterations and we found it difficult without its by then undoubted help.

At the beginning of November the Lucy Baldwin came back, carefully packed and protected. From then until the end of March 1961 a further 232 cases were recorded, making a total of 1,035 in all. That more have not been obtained is due to the fact that we are a Part 1 training school for pupil midwives and a number of analgesic cases require the combined use of nitrous oxide and air and trichloroethylene and air. But in any case that indicates the need for added oxygen—the patient does obtain nitrous oxide and oxygen.

Nitrous oxide and oxygen has several advantages as an analgesic over nitrous oxide and air. The mother is adequately relieved, is co-operative and not nauseated, and the baby arrives in good condition. The Lucy Baldwin machine is based on the author's ideas.

Nitrous Oxide and Air

The use of nitrous oxide and air has long been found to have disadvantages as the content of oxygen is reduced to approximately 10 per cent. In certain cases this is most undesirable, and all patients are suffering from a certain degree of hypoxia. Nitrous oxide is quickly and pleasantly assimilated but it is not a powerful analgesic if mixed with equal quantities of air. In normal labours it is of reasonable help coupled with other drugs, but in many cases it is not enough.

Trichloroethylene and Air

Recently trichloroethylene and air has been introduced but except for fast labours, where its use is limited to a maximum of three hours, it has the disadvantage of requiring longer for complete excretion and it tends to accumulate. If used with other drugs the effect is certainly not without its dangers to the baby.

Nitrous oxide and oxygen has been tried with some variation of quantity and the optimum seems to be 70 per cent. nitrous oxide and 30 per cent. oxygen. The minimum of 20 per cent. oxygen can be obtained if the key is released to allow the red painted over-ride button to spring out. This should only be used under the supervision of a doctor and is only necessary for inhalation analgesia, used in conjunction with or without local anaesthesia in a surgical procedure.

Of Great Value

The midwives have found that nitrous oxide 70%/oxygen 30% is of great value in those women where the severity of the contractions requires more analgesia, or analgesia is required for women with chest conditions, pre-eclamptic toxaemia, foetal distress or premature labour. It has been found that the woman is adequately relieved, is co-operative and not nauseated; her colour is good and the baby arrives in good condition.

Safety Devices

1. When the oxygen cylinder is empty the nitrous oxide will cease to function and the patient will get only air.
2. There is an emergency button for pure oxygen if needed.
3. The minimum amount of oxygen is restricted to 20 per cent.

Though quite easily moved in hospital, the machine would be too large, in its present form, for district work. The small box at the top is all that is needed and it would seem reasonable to expect a not-too-long-delayed readjustment of the height of the machine and smaller cylinders for district work.

It is hoped that soon the Central Midwives Board will see fit to approve the Lucy Baldwin machine for the use of midwives, as most people will accept that it is a safer method of inhalation analgesia than those at the moment available. Its cost is £145.

[I would like to thank Dr. J. D. Rochford, F.F.A., for his valuable help, and Mrs. Barry who took the photograph. I would also like to thank Dr. John E. Elam, without whose initial help and encouragement none of this would have been possible.]

A FOOTNOTE

Miss Spengler has shown me the report on the Lucy Baldwin machine. But it is not stated that the machine originated from her ideas. Miss Spengler demanded an automatic gas-oxygen analgesia apparatus and would not be comforted. The matter was discussed with the British Oxygen Company, who produced this excellent apparatus.

Consultant in Obstetric Analgesia, Hertfordshire County Council.

Here and There

Miss Phoebe Lai (right), staff nurse at Borneo General Hospital, Jesselton, awarded a BRCS Florence Nightingale Scholarship, is taking a midwifery course at the Women's Hospital, Wolverhampton.

Hull Retirement

Miss D. H. Dronfield, matron, Castle Hill Hospital, Hull, retires at the end of October after 25 years' service in this post. Miss Dronfield trained at Sheffield Royal Hospital, the City Hospital, Lodge Moor, Sheffield, and took her housekeeping certificate at King's College, London. She was assistant matron and later matron at the Borough Isolation Hospital and Sanatorium, Derby. Among the many improvements which she was instrumental in achieving at Castle Hill Hospital was the provision of flatlets for senior nursing staff.

Guildford Cathedral Windows

A special hospital Sunday service will be held in the Cathedral of the Holy Spirit, Guildford, on Sunday, October 22, at 3 p.m. During the service the windows presented by doctors, nurses, midwives, dentists and physiotherapists will be dedicated by the Lord Bishop of Guildford, who will also be preaching.

Psychiatric Day Hospital, N. Ireland

Northern Ireland's first day hospital for psychiatric patients has opened in the centre of Belfast.

Patients are required to attend for seven hours a day, five days a week, from 9.30 a.m. to 4.30 p.m. Designed to take between 25 and 30 patients at a time, it is laid out rather like a club with several average-sized rooms for occupational therapy, one or two smaller ones to which patients can retire at those times when they feel like being alone, and a number of small wards in which they can rest after treatment. The treatment rooms are equipped to provide almost everything that is normally needed in a mental hospital.

It is intended indeed as a half-way house between the mental hospital and the day clinic. It is also intended to use the day hospital for patients discharged from Purdysburn and Holywell Hospitals.

St. Luke's Day

The Guild of Health, through its chairman, Canon Wallace Bird, reminds us that St. Luke's Day, Wednesday, October 18, is an occasion particularly suitable for offering prayers for those engaged in nursing and all its branches. The Guild (which is inter-denominational) is in close contact with the Churches Council of Healing, has groups of members in various parts of the country who, among their activities, undertake to pray for individual sick people in their area if requested to do so. Nearer to the date dedicated to St. Luke, the Physician, the Guild intends to give further suggestions on the subject of prayers suitable to the occasion.

National Fire Prevention Week

This autumn, for the first time in this country, there will be a national campaign aimed at focusing the public's attention on the perils of fire and the part they can play in taking adequate and sensible measures of prevention. The campaign is sponsored by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents (RoSPA).

The campaign begins early in October, but the peak period will be the National Fire Prevention Week which is being held from October 30 to November 4.

Nurses' Christmas Card

A very attractive Christmas card, depicting in colour the Westminster Abbey nurses' memorial chapel stained glass window, is already available. These cards are offered by the National Florence Nightingale Memorial Committee, and cost 6d. each (including envelope), from the Committee at 7, Grosvenor Crescent, London, S.W.1. Bulk orders for redistribution would be much appreciated by October 1.

APARTHEID . . .

. . . prevents black and white nurses training together. There is only very limited experience to be gained in post-registration courses for non-white nurses in South Africa. If non-white nurses come to the UK for post-registration experience they need to deposit £50 for a passport and pay the passage money. As non-white nurses are paid only a proportion of the salary paid to white nurses, most of them are unable to save the money.

Father Martin Jarrett-Kerr, C.R. (author of African Pulse), has launched a special appeal for funds to enable nurses from Southern Africa to come to this country, the moneys being used for passport deposits and fares. Readers of the Nursing Times have already donated nearly £200—can we make a special effort and make it £500?

Don't you need ANADIN REGD. too?

Everyone turns to you for help and advice. To whom do you turn on those occasions* when the inevitable colicky pains and backache appear? Why not turn to Anadin tablets. Two tablets can be taken quite safely at two-hourly intervals for two doses and then three or four hourly as necessary.

There is no danger of addiction. The only effect, apart from a rapid alleviation of pain, is an uplifting of mental morale—so essential at these difficult times.

* It has been reliably computed that the incidence of dysmenorrhoea in the Nursing Profession as a whole is higher than in any other section of the population.

RCN OFFICIAL STATEMENT

On August 29, 1961, the National Union of Teachers convened a conference to which were invited 'all appropriate organizations whose members are engaged in Local Government or Government Service and whose salary negotiations are susceptible to Government intervention.'

The Royal College of Nursing was one of the organizations approached and three representatives attended as non-voting observers. The conference passed unanimously the following resolution:

'This conference of organizations representing 683,000 employees in the public service expresses its strongest opposition to the Chancellor's imposition of the 'pause' in the public sector and to the Government's interference with the independence of negotiating machinery and arbitration procedures.

This conference rejects this policy as being unjust, unreasonable and seriously damaging to good staff relations.'

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was informed of this resolution and asked to meet representatives of the organizations so that the views expressed might be amplified.

The Royal College of Nursing has now accepted an invitation to be represented on the deputation to meet the Chancellor and to take part as a full member in any future conference. This step has been taken because the College holds firmly to the view that there should be no interference with established negotiating machinery and it also hopes to safeguard the economic position of nurses and to ensure that the claim for revised salaries which has been submitted by the Staff Side to the Management Side of the Nurses and Midwives Whitley Council is not prejudiced.

At the same time the College has made it very clear that in no circumstances would it be prepared to support or associate itself with any action which could involve a limitation of the service given by nurses, as this would be completely contrary to professional nursing ethics and to the principles of the Royal College of Nursing.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE

The name "Gloucestershire" brings to mind old churches, country villages, the Cotswolds and the Vale of the Severn. Although for many centuries agriculture has been the main occupation, there is now an exceedingly wide range of industries carried on. The county has excellent main roads, railways and waterways. Cheltenham, with its celebrated establishments, has been regarded for many years as the educational centre of the county, while excellent modern shopping centres are to be found both here and in the county town of Gloucester, sometimes referred to as the "Crossroads of England".
